THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Deacon & Peterson, Publishers.
NUMBER SIXTY-SIX SOUTH THIRD ST.

Two Dollars Per Annum, In Advance.
THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

EDMUND DEACON, HENRY PETERSON, } EDITORS AND PROPRIETORS.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS.

CLUBS.—FOR TERMS TO CLUBS, SEE PROSPECTUS ON THIRD PAGE.

DEVOTED TO MORALITY, PURE LITERATURE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC NEWS, AGRICULTURE, THE COMMERCIAL INTEREST, SCIENCE, ART AND AMUSEMENT.

VOLUME XXVIII. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1849. WHOLE NO. 1453.

Choice Poetry.

THE THREE SISTERS.

"We are three sisters worn with grief and tears,
Grown grey with sorrow rather than with years;
Well versed in grief, dejected, and deprest,
Each deems her own has been the hardest part.
Approach, the poet knows the human heart—
He it thy task to set the strife at rest.

First, learn my grief, how fearful and how deep;
Hurting, I woke from childhood's rosy sleep,
The bud unclosed, a re-set thrill came o'er me—
Love's breath drew forth the blossom to the light,
A hero raised me to his own proud height,
And life and all its charms lay bright before me!

Already with the bridal myrtle crowned,
For him in whom my very being was bound,
I watched with mingled fear and rapture glowing
The marriage torches cast their ruddy glare—
They brought me in his corpse and laid it there;
From seven deep wounds his crimson heart's blood flowing.

The nameless horror of that awful night,
That is the image stamped upon my sight;
Waking or sleeping, oh! it haunts me still
I cannot live—to death I now belong
And yet I cannot die! Oh God! how long
Must all these tortures last that will not kill?"

My second took the word with trembling frame;
The image is of blood, and not of shame.
"That weeping doll, or walking mode her view
My heart, too, aspired to that lofty divine,
Anguish and rapture, they save both been mine;
In me the cup of love has mantled, too.

"The glory vanished from the loved one's brow,
I saw him selfish, sensual! How indeed now
Has it glittered, yet I loved him—I love him still!
He died—it seems yet chains him to her side,
Or raving madness drove him to her and wine,
I know not; but the grief is all mine own."

She ceased. Her sister sadly took the word:
"Thou pettest now their sorrows then had heard,
Uncertain how to choose between the twain
Have they not lived and loved? Our common doom,
Though Sorrow wept them in her veil of gloom,
And bade them to the deep her chalice drain.

"In one brief sentence all my bitter course
Of sorrow centre; then, sorrow, be quiet,
Ere yet thy dual jod present thee sages,
And learn my better right—to clearly proved.
Four words comprise it,—I once never loved
The pains of grief, then will I know, to cease."

CHAMISSO.

Pictures of Life.

ISABEL DENISON.

A Story of the heart.

"Tis an old tale, and often told.—Mossman.

CHAPTER I.

Then pretty was your brother man,
Still prettier were women:
Though they may sing a woman wrong,
To step aside is human.

Then, at the balance, let's be mute,
We never can adjust it;
What's good for one may not suit another,
But know not what's received.—Burns.

In the close back room of a small ornamented cottage, on the outskirts of the village of Ellerton, in the scene of an old manor lay an infant of a few hours old. It seemed about to resign its short life, to close forever the eyes which had only just opened on the world. Two girls—one of about seventeen, the other twenty-three years of age—stood beside the nurse anxiously watching the feeble struggles of the child.

"Mary, Mary, come!" at last asked the older one. "Fan Amy!"

"I am scared it must, Miss Shepherd! I've seen many babies very weak like, just at the first, but never one so bad as this."

"I will go and tell Amy then—she may wish to give it one look while it is still alive."

Miss Shepherd walked slowly into the next room, and softly unfrew the curtains of the bed. "Amy," she murmured.

The invalid opened her large blue eyes, and turned her pale face on her sister.

"Amy, dear Amy, I'm afraid your poor child is very ill! Nurse thinks it cannot live long. I thought it best to come and tell you."

"It is well," whispered the young mother; "then my child is safe in heaven!" And she languidly closed her eyes again, and turned away her face.

Surprised, and somewhat startled, Rachel Shepherd continued to watch by the child. An hour passed away, during which it seemed to be struggling with death. Then a change came—the livid hue disappeared, and at length it slightly unclosed its eyes.

"It will live," said the nurse, with a smile of triumph, and she got up to lay it in the cradle.

"Let me take it to Amy," said Charlotte, the younger girl, "it will please her so much to see it for one moment." And taking the tiny roll of flannel in her arms, she approached her sister.

Amy your child will live—live to bless you."

Again the invalid opened her eyes, and kissed the child, which Charlotte held to her lips, while she murmured some words too feebly to be heard. But no smile passed over her face, and again she turned away, almost as if displeased at the interruption.

"Amy seems very weak, nurse," said Charlotte, as she gave her back the child; "is it right to be so?"

Mrs Roberts walked quickly into the next room, and softly unfrew the curtains of the bed. "Amy," she murmured.

The invalid opened her large blue eyes, and turned her pale face on her sister.

"Amy, dear Amy, I'm afraid your poor child is very ill! Nurse thinks it cannot live long. I thought it best to come and tell you."

"It is well," whispered the young mother; "then my child is safe in heaven!" And she languidly closed her eyes again, and turned away her face.

Surprised, and somewhat startled, Rachel Shepherd continued to watch by the child. An hour passed away, during which it seemed to be struggling with death. Then a change came—the livid hue disappeared, and at length it slightly unclosed its eyes.

"It will live," said the nurse, with a smile of triumph, and she got up to lay it in the cradle.

"Let me take it to Amy," said Charlotte, the younger girl, "it will please her so much to see it for one moment." And taking the tiny roll of flannel in her arms, she approached her sister.

"Amy your child will live—live to bless you."

Again the invalid opened her eyes, and kissed the child, which Charlotte held to her lips, while she murmured some words too feebly to be heard. But no smile passed over her face, and again she turned away, almost as if displeased at the interruption.

"Amy seems very weak, nurse," said Charlotte, as she gave her back the child; "is it right to be so?"

Mrs Roberts walked quickly into the next room, then in a moment flew past Charlotte down the stairs of the cottage. In another minute she returned with the village doctor, and they went together into Amy's room. A short time after, the latter came out with a grave face and asked for Miss Shepherd. Rachel approached.

"I am sorry to tell you, Miss Shepherd, that abruptly, that your sister is dying. But she is past my skill—I fear she has not many hours to live."

"Poor Amy," said Rachel, calmly. "I feared it would be thus. Her short, sad life is ended."

This was spoken musingly, as if to herself. Then turning to the doctor, she begged him to be so kind as to send Mr Price to them immediately. He kindly shook her hand and withdrew.

Rachel again approached her sister's bed.

"How do you feel, Amy? she tenderly asked.

"Better," said the poor girl, and for the first time she roused herself and a smile played on her lips.

"Do you really feel better, Amy? I feared it was not so; Mr. Franklin—"

"I know what you would say, Rachel,—I am dying!—I feel it, and I am happy to die."

"Have you no fear?" asked Rachel, bending over her.

"Should I be afraid, Rachel? I have suffered so much I have thought so much of death—perhaps it is because I am so weak—but I feel happy to die."

"I have sent for Mr. Price, dear Amy, and he will talk to you. Will you look at your poor little child before he comes?" She fetched the infant, now sleeping, and laid it by its mother's side. "We shall call it Amy!" she said, tenderingly.

"No, Rachel, don't let it be like its poor mother. What is his mother's name?—I am so weak, I forget it." She was silent for a moment. "Ah! I remember—he told me it was Isabel—call her Isabel—his mother's name may touch him more than his poor wife's. Oh, Rachel! be a mother to my child; and if ever you see George again, tell him how I loved him and prayed for him. I am very weak—let Mr. Price come quickly."

A few hours later, Mrs. Denison calmly breathed her last.

Mr Shepherd had been for nearly fifty years curate of Ellerton. The rectors had changed many times, but he had always, not, perhaps, without reason, been passed over. After a time he became indifferent about preferment, a small private fortune enabling him to live in tolerable comfort; and he wished for nothing that would remove him from Ellerton, to which he was much attached. He was a good man, kind-hearted and charitable—but of little intellect, of little knowledge beyond the commonest theological attainments, and of little marked character of any sort. He had married a woman far superior to himself, but, though he tenderly loved her, she was even till her death—soon after the birth of her fourth child—unappreciated by her husband.

Of his four children, the youngest—a son—was a midshipman; the three daughters grew up in his house. Rachel and Charlotte Shepherd, the eldest and the youngest, although they were both, in strength of character, superior to him, were cast in the same mould. But Amy, the second, was like her mother, as well in her disposition as in her exquisite beauty; and, though there was much affection there was little sympathy between the sisters. Amy was romantic, dreamy and melancholy—indulging in visions of brightness and refinement, which it was impossible should ever be realized. Her sisters were busy, active, industrious, devoting themselves heart and soul, to the good of the people of Ellerton—in turn catechising, preaching to, and scolding men, women and children. And yet Amy was more beloved than they were, though, partly from timidity and partly from indolence, she was unable to busy herself after their fashion; still whenever sorrow or sickness was to be found there was she might be seen, with her soft voice and softest manner, comforting and relieving. A gushing hand, a small degree of sympathy, and all might have been well with her; but these she found not. To her mind—although they hardly found her to the neighbors, who could not understand her—she was a foolish, sentimental girl, and nothing more.

One of Amy's passions was scenery; one of her greatest pleasures to wander along the river banks, or in the beautiful woods that surrounded Ellerton. Enough again and again repelled, she was always trying to make her sisters partake in her pleasure—but, though they come, not, now and then, to go with her out of good nature, even Rachel could not conceal from her that she thought it a very useless way of spending her time, and, at length, Amy grew to prefer solitude to unwilling companions. Many and many a day, therefore, she wandered alone, till, one summer afternoon, as she slowly walked along the path of a slow copse of wood belonging to a deserted Manor House, with her eyes fixed on the ground, she suddenly came upon a young man of noble and rather foreign-looking appearance. He was lying on the grass, with a couple of dogs by his side. Struck by her extreme beauty, as Amy paused, blushed, and then walked on again, he rose, and involuntarily took off his hat, then calling to his dogs to follow him, went off in an opposite direction. She had not, however, walked much further before she met the young man again. As they drew near to each other, he made a slight sign to one of his dogs; the animal flew at Amy, who stopped, timid and terrified. The stranger came hastily forward and called his dog, and begged her pardon; and so, without fault on Amy's side, began her acquaintance with Captain Denison.

It is needless to trace the progress of that acquaintance. Within three weeks from the day of their first meeting Amy was missing from her father's house. To be loved with intense devotion, to be a first object to some human being, to find sympathy, that most entire sympathy of love—these were temptations greater than she could withstand; and she left all to be the wife of one almost a stranger to her, but who, she felt, loved her.

Three months passed, and Amy returned to her home with a broken heart. For a month, Captain Denison had lingered out of her sight; for, by her wish, kind and attentive, but far less devoted, the third month he spent principally in London, while Amy remained at the small country town where he had married her. At the end of the third month he returned one evening, after an absence of six days. He filled her with joy and his manner had resumed all its original passionate devotion. After dinner he suddenly got up, kissed her with fond affection, and left the room. Two hours afterward a servant brought her a letter. It contained the certificate of their marriage a bank bill for a thousand pounds, and a few words from himself. He had found he had not dared to confess his marriage to his father; that he could remain at ——— no longer; that he was ordered to sail for India early on the following morning; that it might be years before he returned to England. With many expressions of love he bade her farewell, commending their secret to her keeping, but added not one word as to the place of his destination beyond that it was India.

After a few days of anguish, embittered by remorse, Amy returned to her home. A month afterward, her father died. She never knew that not now on her account was the principal cause of that illness which broke him down. Her sisters felt that it would add an intolerable load to the grief and repentance that seemed to weigh her to the dust and they were silent. She had asked and obtained his pardon, and to her, with her gentle voice and tender ways, it was given, more than all others, to soothe and bless his dying hour.

CHAPTER II.

Jaxan, I know that all must hate my father
Jaxan, I fear that all should hate my father;
And therefore, Jaxan, must his daughter's love,
Her faithful, her deep, her fervent love,
Make up to him before and lavishly twice
The tortured affections of his kind.
Fall of Jerusalem.

After the death of Amy and their father, the widow of a younger brother of Mr. Shepherd came to live with her nieces, and, in their worldly circumstances, they were more comfortable than they had ever been. The two girls continued their former way of life, except that, with every succeeding year, the child of her sister asked and received more and more of the attention of Miss Shepherd; and never was a favorite daughter brought up more tenderly than the father-less and mother-less Isabel Denison.

In her first childhood, she gave her aunt no mixed pleasure, for she was a lovely, gentle, affectionate child, and, indifferent as Rachel was to personal appearance in general, even she could not but feel pleasure in the surpassing beauty of her charge. Isabel had the fair complexion and dark auburn hair of her mother, but her figure, her features, and the expression of her countenance were entirely different. Captain Denison's mother was a Spaniard, and her grandchild had the dark, soft, brilliant Spanish eye, yet more striking and brilliant, contrasted with her fair skin. Already, even in childhood, too, her figure promised that undulating grace and dignity common to the Spanish women. She was indeed exquisitely beautiful—and, as she walked along by the side of her aunt, with her noble, almost stately air, and her dark curls waving on her shoulders, the cottagers would come to their doors to gaze, and many a traveller paused upon his way, to admire and to smile upon her.

By degrees, however, as the peculiarities of her character developed themselves, some of the earnest, as well as the joys of education appeared. There was, at times, a haughtiness and reserve in the little girl, which completely puzzled her aunt, and there were fancies, wh ms and ridiculous, dislikes and antipathies, wh h Rachel could not understand, and which she hardly knew whether to punish as faults, or to pass over unnoticed.

"I cannot understand Isabel," she would say to her sister, "when I take her among the poor people, she is so gentle, that I am quite pleased with her; but, if she goes with me to visit our neighbors, she draws herself up as if there was no one good enough for her to speak to."

The fact was, that the little girl had an instinctive delight to every thing vulgar. Many children show this dislike very early, unconsciously shrinking from vulgarity and noise, as if refinement of mind were a part of the innocency of childhood. In Isabel, however, it was more than dislike—she seemed to shudder at it.

The first event that broke the monotony of her life, was the marriage of Charlotte Shepherd, at which marriage she expressed the strongest disapprobation. A Mr. Jones, who had been clerk in a counting house in London, unexpectedly came into possession of a small property in the neighborhood of Ellerton. Charlotte, though rather on a large scale, was at six-and-twenty, still very handsome, and, even at their first meeting, was selected by Mr. Jones from the young ladies of the place, as the fortunate mistress of his house.

One evening, Mrs. Shepherd, her nieces, and Isabel, were sitting at tea, at the usual hour of seven, when Mr. Jones appeared. It was the third visit he had paid to their house in the course of a week, and in Rachel's eyes this looked very suspicious.

"Won't you take a dish of tea, Mr. Jones?" said old Mrs. Shepherd, as he appeared; "you will find it very refreshing this warm evening."

Mr. Jones gratefully accepted the offer, drew up a chair to the table, and said, turning to Isabel—

"Good evening, little lady; what, are you setting up to tea? In my day, children were seeing at this hour."

Isabel looked unutterable things, but made no answer.

"Not quite so strong if you please, Mrs. Shepherd; and, if I might suggest, the sugar, five lumps, before the cream. I've lived a bachelor life so long that you must excuse my being a little particular." How was a glance at Charlotte

"But I hope you don't mean to be a bachelor much longer, sir," said Mrs. Shepherd; "your new house must want a mistress."

"Very true, ma'am, and the master, too. In London, I had only to look out of the window, and I had plenty of company; but I have not grown to think trees and flowers companions yet. How should you like to live alone, my little lady?

"Very much, sir," replied Isabel, softly.

"Should you, indeed? Well, I am a social animal myself, and I think one little quiet party like this, worth whole days of solitude. I never could understand what people found to like in solitude. I hope you don't like it, Miss Charlotte?"

"No," she said, laughing; "I don't think I do at all."

"Oh, Miss Shepherd, by the by, I wished to speak to you about some money-matters. As I am come home, till one summer afternoon, as she slowly walked along the path of a slow copse of wood belonging to a deserted Manor House, with her eyes fixed on the ground, she suddenly came upon a young man of noble and rather foreign-looking appearance. He was lying on the grass, with a couple of dogs by his side. Struck by her extreme beauty, as Amy paused, blushed, and then walked on again, he rose, and involuntarily took off his hat, then calling to his dogs to follow him, went off in an opposite direction. She had not, however, walked much further before she met the young man again. As they drew near to each other, he made a slight sign to one of his dogs; the animal flew at Amy, who stopped, timid and terrified. The stranger came hastily forward and called his dog, and begged her pardon; and so, without fault on Amy's side, began her acquaintance with Captain Denison.

It is needless to trace the progress of that acquaintance. Within three weeks from the day of their first meeting Amy was missing from her father's house. To be loved with intense devotion, to be a first object to some human being, to find sympathy, that most entire sympathy of love—these were temptations greater than she could withstand; and she left all to be the wife of one almost a stranger to her, but who, she felt, loved her.

Three months passed, and Amy returned to her home with a broken heart. For a month, Captain Denison had lingered out of her sight; for, by her wish, kind and attentive, but far less devoted, the third month he spent principally in London, while Amy remained at the small country town where he had married her. At the end of the third month he returned one evening, after an absence of six days. He filled her with joy and his manner had resumed all its original passionate devotion. After dinner he suddenly got up, kissed her with fond affection, and left the room. Two hours afterward a servant brought her a letter. It contained the certificate of their marriage a bank bill for a thousand pounds, and a few words from himself. He had found he had not dared to confess his marriage to his father; that he could remain at ——— no longer; that he was ordered to sail for India early on the following morning; that it might be years before he returned to England. With many expressions of love he bade her farewell, commending their secret to her keeping, but added not one word as to the place of his destination beyond that it was India.

After a few days of anguish, embittered by remorse, Amy returned to her home. A month afterward, her father died. She never knew that not now on her account was the principal cause of that illness which broke him down. Her sisters felt that it would add an intolerable load to the grief and repentance that seemed to weigh her to the dust and they were silent. She had asked and obtained his pardon, and to her, with her gentle voice and tender ways, it was given, more than all others, to soothe and bless his dying hour.

CHAPTER II.

Jaxan, I know that all must hate my father
Jaxan, I fear that all should hate my father;
And therefore, Jaxan, must his daughter's love,
Her faithful, her deep, her fervent love,
Make up to him before and lavishly twice
The tortured affections of his kind.
Fall of Jerusalem.

After the death of Amy and their father, the widow of a younger brother of Mr. Shepherd came to live with her nieces, and, in their worldly circumstances, they were more comfortable than they had ever been. The two girls continued their former way of life, except that, with every succeeding year, the child of her sister asked and received more and more of the attention of Miss Shepherd; and never was a favorite daughter brought up more tenderly than the father-less and mother-less Isabel Denison.

In her first childhood, she gave her aunt no mixed pleasure, for she was a lovely, gentle, affectionate child, and, indifferent as Rachel was to personal appearance in general, even she could not but feel pleasure in the surpassing beauty of her charge. Isabel had the fair complexion and dark auburn hair of her mother, but her figure, her features, and the expression of her countenance were entirely different. Captain Denison's mother was a Spaniard, and her grandchild had the dark, soft, brilliant Spanish eye, yet more striking and brilliant, contrasted with her fair skin. Already, even in childhood, too, her figure promised that undulating grace and dignity common to the Spanish women. She was indeed exquisitely beautiful—and, as she walked along by the side of her aunt, with her noble, almost stately air, and her dark curls waving on her shoulders, the cottagers would come to their doors to gaze, and many a traveller paused upon his way, to admire and to smile upon her.

By degrees, however, as the peculiarities of her character developed themselves, some of the earnest, as well as the joys of education appeared. There was, at times, a haughtiness and reserve in the little girl, which completely puzzled her aunt, and there were fancies, wh ms and ridiculous, dislikes and antipathies, wh h Rachel could not understand, and which she hardly knew whether to punish as faults, or to pass over unnoticed.

"I cannot understand Isabel," she would say to her sister, "when I take her among the poor people, she is so gentle, that I am quite pleased with her; but, if she goes with me to visit our neighbors, she draws herself up as if there was no one good enough for her to speak to."

The fact was, that the little girl had an instinctive delight to every thing vulgar. Many children show this dislike very early, unconsciously shrinking from vulgarity and noise, as if refinement of mind were a part of the innocency of childhood.

Our Portrait Gallery.

JOSEPH, BARON DE JELLACHICH, BAN OF THE CROATS.

with. But what would you do should he return and claim you?

She looked up at him with some surprise. "Go to him," she said, simply.

"And leave us all? Rachel, too, who has been like a mother to you?" said he, with some asperity.

Isabel fixed her dark expressive eyes on his face, as if they would speak all the feelings of her heart; and he seemed to understand her, for he hastily pressed her hand, and they walked on again, in silence. It was again Isabel that broke it

"Do you remember my mother, Uncle James?"

"Remember her!" he said hastily. The one bitter feeling that brooded within him had been aroused by her manner of speaking of her father, and he was still somewhat under its influence—"Remember Amy, who was more to me than all the world besides? No, Isabel," he continued, with some bitterness—"it was not I who forgot her; it was one nearer to her than even I am."

"You have not forgiven my father," she said, sadly.

"Yes," he answered, after a pause, "I have forgiven him. It has been a long, long struggle—it has darkened my whole life; but I have forgiven him. There was a time when I thought my hand should avenge her; but it is past—yes, I have forgiven him: yes, Isabel, for your sake, I have forgiven him now.

"Is she very weak? asked the little girl, passionately, "if I can't see her."

"Why, my dear," asked Mrs. Shepherd, "what can you see to imitate in Mr. Jones?"

"Don't ask her, aunt," said Rachel, "Isabel is very naughty to talk so, and she knows it."

Isabel said no more; but the tears swelling to her large eyes, shamed from have sweep a feeling she had spoken, and even Rachel was sorry for her when, on the return of Mr. Jones, radiant with happiness, she saw her shrink from the two fond kisses which he imprinted on each cheek

The time passed on after Charlotte's marriage and every day the difference of character between the aunt and niece became more apparent, but it did not diminish the affection existing on side for the other. Isabel was a child of feeling, and in all Rachel's great principles—her rigid sense of duty, her reverence for truth, her self-denial and self-control, she more than acquiesced. To her narrow minded views of men and things, her opinion of the frivolousness of accomplishments, her utter indifference to all the light literature of the day, she also implicit; but it was with a pain which those only who pioneered, like her, a craving after the knowledge of all that was great and noble, could comprehend. It was her disappointment in this respect which, more than everything else, kept the memory of her sister alive in her heart. Amy had kept the time could come, when he would remember her, and that with him her brightest visions would be realized. The only talent which Rachel had allowed her to cultivate, was her natural taste for music; and permission for this had been obtained with difficulty and only through the intercession of Isabel's early enemy, Mr. Jones, who was fond of it; but, the permission once given, she practised with the energy of genius; and, in after years, so many a dull and lonely hour was brightened by the beauty of her playing, that Rachel never repented the indulgence she had granted

The next event, and it was a great event in Isabel Denison's quiet life was the return of her uncle, Captain Shepherd, after twenty years' absence from Ellerton. He had travelled all over the world; had conversed with every variety of person—he sang, he sketched, he spoke almost every language in the world, he seemed, to his enchanted niece to know every thing, and to do every thing in the world! In addition, he had the frank happy, joyous and yet refined manners of a sailor, and the charm was complete.

At the time of his return Isabel was a beautiful girl of fifteen, fully able to appreciate all he could teach, all he could tell; and he devoted himself, with great kindness, and much pleasure, to amuse, enlighten, and improve her ardent and inquiring mind. To her it was as a new life, as a bright dream; and too soon the flying visit was over and she must again awake to the common existence of Ellerton.

The day before he left them, Captain Shepherd asked Isabel to walk with him to his sister's, and, Rachel being occupied, they were alone. They proceeded for some time in silence. Captain Shepherd was in low spirits at parting Isabel was thinking. At last the broke the silence.

"Do you think you shall be going to India, Uncle James, in the course of your travels?

"Yes, I think it very likely—most likely, indeed. Probably before six months have passed, I may be there. But why do you ask, Isabel? Have you any commissions?" he added, laughingly.

"Yes," she said, in a low voice. "Do you think my father is still there?"

Captain Shepherd was surprised. Rachel had told him that she never mentioned her father.

"He was there three years ago," he answered. "I happened to see his name in the newspapers;—but, even if he should be there now, India is a large place, dear Isabel, and I am not likely to see him—nor to wish to see him," he added, with a frown, "unless, indeed, you desire it."

Isabel sighed. "It is quite natural, Uncle James, she said, "that you should not think of him, except for a moment almost to hate him; but I am his child, and I feel, in spite of all, as if I loved him; and I wish he could know this. You don't think me wrong to love him?" she asked, anxiously, seeing his brows still contracted.

"No, Isabel. I had not thought of it in that light; but I suppose it may be natural. If I should chance to find him, for your sake, I will do as you a person? The young ladies of Ellerton will think of nothing else. He appears to me to be only fit for a fine London preacher; such as Mr. Jones tells us about!

"I don't think you need be in a fidget, Aunt Rachel, said Isabel. "Mr Grey does not look as if he meant to be very familiar with any of us. He is too grave for any of the girls here; they will take of him for a week, but when they see that he does not think of them, as I fe sure he will not, they will soon grow tired of looking at him."

Rachel and Isabel were both right. There was a great excitement at first—a great deal of gossip; but Mr. Grey devoted himself to his duties, and kept entirely aloof from the society of the place, and the interest in him soon passed away.

Herbert Grey (I must briefly give his history) was the only son of General Grey, a distinguished officer, who also possessed a small property of about £1,000 or £1,500 a year. He wished his only son to become a lawyer, both on account of the talents early shown by the boy, and also that he might keep him in England, and he able altogether to withdraw him from his profession if sickness or old age should make him anxious for his society. Herbert Grey, therefore, went to Oxford. At one-and-twenty, he formed a violent attachment to a beautiful girl, the daughter of a banker in the neighborhood. She returned his love; there was no great objection to the marriage, and, consent being given on all sides, they were merely to wait till he had gone through the first hard study necessary to his profession. They were engaged—they appeared to live but for each other, and they parted only for six months, during which time he was to begin his studies in London. Before the six months had passed, the girl had chosen another and a richer lover, and the first that Herbert heard of her mental acts was the announcement of her marriage in the newspapers.

His love had been intense; his suffering was agony. This blow deprived him at all trust in human truth and goodness, and above all, of all trust in woman. It so wore in him, whose soul he thought he had read, and had found there nothing but purity and brightness, where could truth be sought? Yet the effect of this bitter experience upon him was unusual. In general, it is ruinous to the character of a man; for suspicion of evil in others is the creation of evil in ourselves; but Herbert, after the first agony had passed, though he felt a kind of scorn of human nature, yet seemed to look with something of the pity of an angel on the race he despised.

His own dream of life was over; he sickened at the thought of the lady, but there arose a hope within him, as he said to his father, "O, being able to comfort the poor and the wretched, now that he knew what suffering was. With a most passionate supplicate, he entreated his permission to go into the church, and at last it was given. Since that time, three years had passed, and he now arrived at Ellerton as curate to Mr Price, who was an old friend of his father's.

Isabel was right. Herbert Grey quickly showed that the young ladies of the place occupied not the least portion of his thoughts. He kept aloof from all society, devoting himself to study, and to unceasing labor among the poor. Even on Miss Shepherd he never called again. Occasionally she and Isabel met him in their walks, but a bow, or, at most, a few hurried words, was all that was exchanged between them. Isabel was disappointed, there was something, not only in his appearance, but far more in his preaching, that interested Isabel—a rigidness of duty—a severity at times—too great, in many only repelling and despairing (the taking evil on his one painful experience), but which to her, to whom great thoughts were as the food of life, was unspeakably attracting. She often shrank from his words, but at the same time they seemed to fill her with new thoughts and feelings. She was disappointed and yet, even in her disappointment there was pleasure. She could not have borne that he should go gossiping from house to house, as Mr Price, good and kind as he was, was in the habit of doing.

It is possible they might have gone on for months without any greater degree of acquaintance, had it not happened that one hot Sunday afternoon Isabel was alone with old Mrs Shepherd at church. There was but a small congregation, and such as it was, it consisted principally of old women and children. In the middle of the prayers, Isabel suddenly fainted. There was no one who could assist her and Herbert Grey, who sat below the reading desk, before the sermon, himself carried her into the churchyard. Whether he was struck by the extreme beauty and interest of her appearance, as she lay so deadly pale, or whether it was but an act of common courtesy can not now be known, but he called the next day with Mr. Price to inquire after her—Rachel was not at home; Miss Shepherd had always a great deal to say to Mr. Price, and Herbert was left to Isabel. She immediately thanked him gratefully for his kindness.

"Don't speak of it," he said, "how could I do otherwise? I hope you are not subject to these fainting fits?"

"I have had them before, but not this year, and I had quite forgotten all about them. Mr. Franklin has made me very angry to day, by forbidding me to kneel down; but I can't obey him, can I?"

"I should think," said Herbert, gently, "that would be better than what happened yesterday.—Will he not forbid your going to church at all, if you are wilful?"

"I am not afraid of that. Aunt Rachel would never think that could be a right thing to do."

"How very good your aunt seems to be," said Herbert after a pause. "She is always employed for others."

"She is indeed, "said Isabel, warmly, "she thinks only of doing good."

"And you, Miss Denison—" with a slight inquiring smile.

Isabel shook her head. "I am not like my aunt, she said; "I can not, I really can not despise every earthly thing as she does. There seems to me so much that is good and beautiful in this world, and must it all be disregarded? I hope you don't agree with my aunt, Mr. Grey?"

"No, I don't think I do—not, at least, if we remember that the beauty of earth—by which I suppose you mean arts, and what are called accomplishments—are passing things, not made to occupy our hearts."

"I am not satisfied," said Isabel, "you call them passing things; now it seems to me that whatever is beautiful is far more—that it must have an influence forever."

"I am ready, if you are ready, Grey," called Mr Price, get up, up. Herbert now obeyed.

"Mr. Price has promised to drink tea with us to-morrow," said Mrs. Shepherd; "quite a family party. Now, do, Mr. Grey, join us for this once."

"I am afraid I must not break my rule; though I thank you very much for your invitation." He eye glanced for an instant at Isabel. "Perhaps you will allow me to call in the evening, and walk home with Mr. Price?"

Isabel was singing, when Herbert came in the following evening. Captain Shepherd's parting gift had been an excellent piano forte, and Mr. Jones, in his flying visits to London, amply provided her with songs and music.

"Come, Isabel, don't stop for Mr. Grey," said Mr. Jones, as she paused; "begin the song again."

She complied. The air she sang was that beautiful one of Moore's

"Couldst thou look as dear as when first I sighed to thee"

Her voice was a soft, deep contralto, that voice the most capable of expression; and her singing, though it possessed none of the brilliancy that masters teach, was touching and beautiful. After the first low lines of the song, a cloud passed over Herbert's face, and shading his eyes with his hands, he remained buried in thought.

"Capital, Isabel" exclaimed Mr Jones, clapping his hands; "you sing better and better every day. I love these sentimental songs they make me feel all mellow, and I prefer this to the last. Now, what shall we have next? He tapped Herbert's shoulder. "What do you say, Mr. Grey?—shall it be sentimental again, or shall we have something to put us into spirits?"

Herbert started from his reverie. "If it were left to my choice, I should ask for the same song again."

"Oh, no, I can't hear of that! It seems to have given you the blue devils already. Come, Isabel, you must choose for us—something to satisfy us all."

"Here is one," she said, turning to Mr. Jones, "which I think you have not heard yet. It is pretty and not so very melancholy as the last." It was Knight's "O! what is the old man thinking?"

When the song was finished, Herbert got up, and came toward her. "You are right, Miss Denison; these things do not pass away some impression they will leave forever."

Isabel looked pleased but made no answer.

"Do you feel like an old man?" he continued, taking up the song and smiling. "You sing as if you did."

"I rather think I do," she answered, laughing. "I never was a very merry child—was I, Aunt Charlotte? I don't remember ever being so noisy as your little things."

"No, but then you were alone, Isabel, and that makes such a difference. I have six," she said with both a smile and a sigh.

Isabel had looked at her aunt, when she turned her head again, she met Herbert's gaze fixed upon her with an expression almost of sternness. It was as if he sought to read her soul. While she sang, some long-forgotten, happy feeling stirred within him; but, mingling with it, arose at the same moment the dark and dreary thoughts of doubt and suspicion, which for a time had seemed to sleep.

He turned away Isabel played a few bars; then, hastily looking up, asked him if he never sang.

"Never," he said shortly, for there came over him a remembrance of the place and time, when and where he last had sung. A silence followed. and Mr. Price, after saying, as he usually did, that it was the pleasantest evening he had ever spent, rose to leave.

CHAPTER IV.

No, and more welcome the thirty numbers
Of minute fall on the sleeper's ear.
When half awaking from fearful slumbers,
He thinks the fall tread of Heaven is near—
Then come that voice, which, all forsaken,
This heart long had sleeping lain,
Not thought its cold pause could ever waken
To voice benign, blessed sounds again.
Moore.

From this time Herbert and Isabel met occasionally. That it was occasionally was his fault, but terror as well as love had taken strong possession of his soul, and when one feeling drove him to seek her, the other, with a strange power, withheld him. Still they met occasionally; most often by accident. And when he was actually in her presence, scruples died away, only, however, to rise more powerfully after each meeting, when he did not spend, and the door closed

Rachel once more shook her head. "It will never do," she said, how could Mr. Price get such a person as this Herbert Grey quickly showed that the young ladies of the place occupied not the least portion of his thoughts. He kept aloof from all society, devoting himself to study, and to unceasing labor among the poor. Even on Miss Shepherd he never called again. Occasionally she and Isabel met him in their walks, but a bow, or, at most, a few hurried words, was all that was exchanged between them. Isabel was disappointed, there was something, not only in his appearance, but far more in his preaching, that interested Isabel—a rigidness of duty—a severity at times—too great, in many only repelling and despairing (the taking evil on his one painful experience), but which to her, to whom great thoughts were as the food of life, was unspeakably attracting. She often shrank from his words, but at the same time they seemed to fill her with new thoughts and feelings. She was disappointed and yet, even in her disappointment there was pleasure. She could not have borne that he should go gossiping from house to house, as Mr Price, good and kind as he was, was in the habit of doing.

It is possible they might have gone on for months without any greater degree of acquaintance, had it not happened that one hot Sunday afternoon Isabel was alone with old Mrs Shepherd at church. There was but a small congregation, and such as it was, it consisted principally of old women and children. In the middle of the prayers, Isabel suddenly fainted. There was no one who could assist her and Herbert Grey, who sat below the reading desk, before the sermon, himself carried her into the churchyard. Whether he was struck by the extreme beauty and interest of her appearance, as she lay so deadly pale, or whether it was but an act of common courtesy can not now be known, but he called the next day with Mr. Price to inquire after her—Rachel was not at home; Miss Shepherd had always a great deal to say to Mr. Price, and Herbert was left to Isabel. She immediately thanked him gratefully for his kindness.

"Don't speak of it," he said, "how could I do otherwise? I hope you are not subject to these fainting fits?"

"I have had them before, but not this year, and I had quite forgotten all about them. Mr. Franklin has made me very angry to day, by forbidding me to kneel down; but I can't obey him, can I?"

"I should think," said Herbert, gently, "that would be better than what happened yesterday.—Will he not forbid your going to church at all, if you are wilful?"

"I am not afraid of that. Aunt Rachel would never think that could be a right thing to do."

"How very good your aunt seems to be," said Herbert after a pause. "She is always employed for others."

"Your hope, then," said Herbert, with some surprise, "is, that he will claim you—that you will live with him?"

"Yes, I do hope it. Surely, surely that is not wrong?"

"You wish then, to leave your aunt—your present life where you can do so much good—and become, perhaps, a fine London lady?" He spoke with sadness rather than harshness.

"I think you are rather severe, Mr. Grey," she answered with great gentleness. "No, I have no wish to be a fine lady, though, perhaps, dreams of a brighter kind of life will sometimes float before my eyes But—do you remember the other day, when I said that I must pity weakness and sin? But, because I pity, do you suppose I forget it? Do you think I ever forget what my father did, and can I hope that he will be forgiven till he returns and remembers me?

She then turned away her head, to hide the tears which started in her eyes, and was immediately seized upon by her other neighbor, the young officer, who was very indignant at having been left entirely to Mrs Chapman, while the beautiful Miss Denison sate by his side. His unceasing raillery continued till dessert was put upon the table, when Isabel took advantage of the intrusion of a long arm between them, to turn a deaf ear to the stream that was murmuring on the other side of her ear.

Herbert had never spoken he had been pondering on what the had said, but now immediately resumed the conversation. "You are right, always right," he began; "but still, you own you have dreams of a lighter life. Could nothing Miss Denison, ever induce you willingly to pass your life in the country—even in an old, old place as Ellerton?" The time, the look, startled her. For the first time, a thrill passed through her heart as she thought he loved her, a thrill at once of pleasure and alarm.

"I think you will mistake me," she answered, with some hesitation. "I don't think that I could ever bear to live very long in a town. It was of people, not of places, that I spoke—or, at least, I think my curiosity about places would very soon be satisfied."

"People, not places," he repeated. "If then, it were possible that you could live in the country—and he fixed his eyes on her as he spoke—" the country, even Ellerton, might satisfy you?"

He look embarrassed her—such a grave, piercing, meaning look. She slightly blushed, then laughed it off.

"You really have catechised me very severely to-night, and I have been very good to answer so many questions. You ought to be afraid of my retaliating. Will you answer me if I begin to question you?"

"If you please," he said, rather sadly; "but I am afraid that my examination will not interest you."

"Oh, yes, it will indeed. One thing will interest me very much, if you will really answer me." She paused a moment to consider if her question was an indiscreet one; then, notwithstanding a secret warning that it was so, boldly asked it.—"Do you remember your telling me the other day that you had reasons for being severe on human nature?"

"Yes, I remember it, and tale he told—the tale of his love, of his hope, of his agony when forsaken. Breathless, agitated, she listened still, when he ended thus—

"It was no light thing to suffer this, the disappointment of every hope; but the suffering itself was as nothing in comparison to the blight it cast upon me; the doubt in the truth of every human being under which I have now suffered for many years. Even you, Miss Denison, in whose face truth and purity are written—even you, at first, I doubted—But it is passed—it is all passed. In your presence, better feelings have come back to me; and never, even under circumstances thrilling in his breast. Her own heart beat, indeed, but it was with doubt, with fear, with bashfulness, with excitement; she hung not on his words as if happiness or misery, almost life or death, were in the balance.

He still tried to be calm. Yet the words burst from him, 'Oh, Isabel! speak to me. Do not fear to tell me the truth. If you cannot love me, if you cannot even hope to love me, doubtless I shall find strength to bear it; only speak to me, but one word!'

"'I did not speak,' she said at last, in her low, sweet tone, 'because I could not. I did not know if my love was worthy of yours. I hardly know now. It is not like yours; it is not enough; but—I think—' The words died away, but she looked up at him and smiled, and placed her hand in his.

They reached the cottage. "May I come in?" asked Herbert.

"No, not to-night. To-morrow, as early as you please."

Isabel walked into the drawing-room, where Rachel sat, alone. She put her arms round her aunt's neck, and kissed her. "Shall you like me to leave you, Aunt Rachel?"

"Oh, Isabel!—is it so, indeed? Even I did not know what you felt for Mr. Grey."

"Nor did I know; nor do I know now; only I think I am happy—very happy."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The World Abroad.

REPORTED EXPRESSLY FOR THE SAT. EVENING POST.

LECTURES ON EUROPE.

BY THE REV. DR. BAIRD.

NO. VI.

SPAIN.

(CONTINUED.)

ITALY.

The Catholic is the only religion tolerated in Spain; and yet there is more liberality of feeling than formerly. A circulation of the Scriptures is permitted, and a good deal in that way has been effected. The Monasteries and Convents of Spain have been mostly broken up. This was done in the time of the Christino, Espartero being Minister. The Monasteries and Convents were ordered to be sold. There was no difficulty in selling the land, but much with the buildings. There used to be seventy Monasteries in Seville, which had 116,000 population. All are now abandoned, except three or four. Cadiz once had twenty-two—but all are now broken up except two or three. The lecturer visited a very large one four miles from Cordova—that of the Santa Morena. It only had three or four Monks in it, and will be sold at the death of those old men. The salutations of the Spaniards were referred to—A Dios! (Good-bye!—God be with you)—Vaya usted con Dios! (Go with God.)

Italy is about half as large as Spain and Portugal combined—not much more than half as large as Greece and Turkey combined. It is in the form of a boot, and contains 102,000 or 103,000 square miles—not larger than Pennsylvania and New Jersey put together. The number of people that speak Italian in the world are 24,000,000—a little the South part of Italy, (Kingdom of the Two Sicilies) 9,000,000. The States of the Church, or Kingdom of the Pope has a population of 2,900,000;—Duchy of Tuscany, with Lucca added to, 1,500,000—Modena and Parma 500,000—and remainder in Austrian Italy and Sardinia. The old Republic of Genoa now belongs to Sardinia. There are seven Governments in Italy.

1—Naples—Kingdom of the Two Sicilies.
2—Rome—The States of the Church, (now a Republic.)
3—Duchy of Modena.
4—Duchy of Parma.
5—Austrian Italy, (Lombardy, Venice, &c.)
6—Kingdom of Sardinia.
7—Florence, (Duchy of Tuscany.)

There is the little Republic of San Marino, and the petty Principality of Monaco. Of the islands—Sicily is a part of Naples—Malta belongs to England, and Corsica to France. No nation has played a more important part in the world than Italy, whether we regard her as Pagan Rome for twelve centuries—or afterwards as Papal Rome for twelve centuries. When Rome was the Capital of the Pagan world,—she was central in all countries bordering on the Mediterranean. It was the finest city in the Old World—and in her hands, instead of all the Empires of antiquity. But since the palmy days of Rome, other great Kingdoms had risen up, such as France and England. Italy consists of two portions, totally dissimilar—the Northern part being the Valley of Po, about 200 miles long from East to West, and 60 wide from North to South. This is a magnificent valley, not large—steamboats navigate the rivers; and a great deal of rice, and all kinds of grain and fruits are raised. The rows of mulberry trees for silkworms—the trees being planted ten feet apart, and oats sown between them, are striking features of the scenery. This part of Italy raises a great deal of wine and a great deal of silk.

Let us look at the peninsular part. The mountains (Apennines) are generally 4,000 or 5,000 feet high—the Lower Apennines 2,000, or 3,000. The valleys amazingly cultivated. There are few or no plains. Rome stands on a plain, however—and Terracina, Salerno and Capua have narrow plains. The greater part of the country is covered with mountains. The islands of Sicily, Corsica and Sardinia are very mountainous. So with the Lipari Islands, one of which is a volcano. The only exception is Malta—which is a mass of rock, that rises up out of the sea, like a brick-kiln. The little island of Elba is emphatically mountainous. None of these insular mountains are so high as to be covered with snow, except Etna. The foot of Etna is fertile,—the top is a cone of black appearance. There are many villages on the sides of Etna. The Southern part of Italy is cultivated in a different way from the North. Olives, oranges, almonds, vines, wheat, rye and Indian corn are general. If we go to Naples, we see corn sold as in New York and this city, the sellers crying "Hot Corn! Hot Corn!" They cultivate in Sicily and the lower part of Italy, tropical fruits and productions. The lecturer went from Venice to Turin, up the middle of the Valley of the Po. The harvest was almost ripe, and the climate beautiful—yet the Alps were covered with snow, and a few of the Apennines. It is not often that summer and winter are brought so close together. The manufactures of Italy are insignificant. Straw hats are made in Tuscany—silks and velvets at Genoa. Statues and paintings are among the chief articles produced. The commerce is small—and one is persuaded to see how small the commerce is even in Genoa and other ports. We have not more than ten ships trading to Italy. England has many more—and France has a good many. Before Napoleon went to Italy, the roads were very bad; but as imperial roads—indeed Napoleon was the greatest road-maker in the world. There are no railroads except two—one from Venice to Milan, 120 or 130 miles, and one round the shores of the Bay of Naples—40 or 50 miles. If Italy were under a good government, those things would be made extensively. A railroad was about to be made from Rome to Bologna, by some English gentlemen. The English and French will, perhaps, do these things in Italy—but surely not the Italians. The stages are good, and a notorious will make 36 or 40 miles a day over all Italy. For education, the Governments have done very little, except Tuscany—but in Lombardy, Austria has done much in that way for the people. The present Pope had done a little, and had gone so far as night schools. The Catholic Church had done very little towards education in Italy. The lecturer had been told by Italians, that instead of sending money to Italy, we should send hundreds of Yankee schoolmasters. Not a quarter of the children of Rome are educated. The monks and nuns have nothing to do, yet they will not lift a finger towards education. Even the Sisters of Charity did not do any thing for education—but they do much to relieve and nurse the poor in times of sickness. The Sisters of Charity in Naples met the Sisters of Charity in Paris for aid in the Cholera. The climate in general does not convince. It is not hot, except for a few weeks. It is naturally a healthy country, except in the marshes, and they would become healthy with draining. Even the Pontine marshes might be drained. With a good government and a good religion, the Italians would be a very good people—but they want education and training. As for the higher education, there are three Universities of very good repute at Padua, Pavia and Pisa—the Ceiling in Roman's lagoons, at Rome—and a College at Palermo. Italy has produced a number of very distinguished authors—but there is no security of copyright; if a man publishes a book in Florence, it is pirated at Rome. The Italians are cast to be a lazy, worthless race, but this is a great mistake. There is a great deal of beauty in Italy, but the laboring classes are bronzed by the sun and by labor. They are mostly dark—brunette and olive—the Norman and Gothic blood having been long absorbed. As to intellect, no one who knows the Italians can deny that they are expert. Even the lazzaroni are not so worthless as described. If they are idle, it is only because they have nothing to do. There is no unwillingness. If you want one, half a dozen will step forward. Their ingenuity is great. Some years since, an English manufacturer of skill and ingenuity was called before a Committee of Parliament, on the subject of Inventions; as he was in the habit of employing workmen of different nations. He was asked which had the most talent. He answered,—"The Italians are the first of all men of Europe for comprehending and doing anything." He further gave as his experience, that the French are the second, 3rd, Swiss, 4th, German, 5th, Scotch, 6th, the English. The English, he said, were the last of all in quickly comprehending and doing—but, then, he said, they are unsurpassed in their patience and perseverance, when once they have the idea. He mentioned no Yankees, but the lecturer then let that he would not have placed the Yankees after the last on the list. The taxes and tithes of Italy are enormous. The land is chiefly owned by the Roman Catholic Church. The Church in Italy is supposed to have half a million of persons, as priests, friars, nuns, &c., &c. For ages it was a custom for rich people to leave estates and legacies to the Church in Italy. Hence its enormous wealth. As to politics, the governments say, in effect, to the people—"You have nothing to do with politics—we will take care of them." Now, here, men think about politics and religion, subjects which stir us up to the lowest depth—but there, if you can conceive of anything just now, to make the people stagnate, back to the present condition of Europe, that you will not find it on this side of Siberia, any how. The Italians are very fond of shows. The prices of admission are small—and they save as much money in candles and firewood at home, when they go out, as will almost pay the price of a box at a theatre. When the lecturer went to Genoa, he was shown by a nobleman, a bust of Washington, said to have been done by Canova—and then another of Paganini. The nobleman asked—"Which do you like the best? Paganini or Washington?" The lecturer said:—"My American feeling was much stirred at the question. For although I like to hear the violin very much, yet I won't consent, on any terms, to place General Washington side by side with a fiddler." The lecturer sketched the character of several of the rulers of Italy, denounced the King of Naples as a very worthless man, and hoped that, ere long, he would be excorcated from being King altogether. He did not think the Sicilians would ultimately succeed. They were 1,000,000 against 9,000,000. The Pope he considered a well-meaning but a weak-minded man. When the Revolution of France came, he was obliged to go further than he intended, and he ruined himself. The lecturer's belief was, that Austria, Spain and other Catholic Governments would put him back, stipulating with France and England to give a Constitution to the Roman people. Or perhaps they might promote the Pope to abdicate, and take one of the five Cardinals on the popular side, in Rome, and make him Pope. The Dukes of Tuscany, Modena, Parma, Lucca, Charles Albert, King of Sardinia, &c., were all passed in brief review by Dr. B., in connexion with recent events, which are familiar to our readers; and he thought that many of the European potentates would be in this country within fifty years. Several of the Catholic ceremonies and processions in Rome were vividly described. A lady said to one of the Popes, who stated to her that he was tired of being carried about on men's shoulders, that she did not wonder at it, as it was so contrary to Christian humility. "Oh, it is not that," replied the Pope, "but it makes me so sea-sick." Of the cities, Palermo contains 160,000 people, Milan 200,000; the Duomo, or Great Cathedral, is the only Gothic building in Italy. The paintings and statues, the subterranean chapel of St. Carlo de Barromeo, La Cena, (the Last Supper) by Leonardo da Vinci, in which the face of the Saviour is so spiritual, and the Iron Crown of Lombardy, (said to be made of the iron with which our Saviour was nailed to the cross,) illustrated Milan deeply interesting. Bologna was crowned with this ancient iron diadem, also the Emperor of Austria. Messina had 80,000 people, Mantua 40,000, Verona 80,000, Padua 50,000, Venice (on 70 islands) 140,000, Florence 100,000, Bologna 80,000, Leghorn 150,000. Genoa and Venice boasted of their republics for centuries, but the lecturer did not believe in them—they were not republics in our sense of the term, but governments of a few rich and noble families. Rome is sixteen miles from the mouth of the Tiber, at Ostia, and contains 185,000 inhabitants. A large portion of the Southern part of the city is not inhabited, owing to the malaria from the marshes. It was a pity that 200,000 or 300,000 Dutch could not be sent there. They would soon drain the marshes, and convert them into fertile fields. Rome used to be supplied with water by thirteen aqueducts. The city is chiefly built of brick, and the houses four stories high. The Piazza del Popolo—Corso (a public Promenade)—the College of the Propaganda—ancient ruins—the Palace of the Caesars—Vatican—Castle of St. Angelo—Pantheon—St. Peter's Church—the Colosseum—were all described and pointed out to the audience on a large plan. There were also paintings of most of the grand objects hung around the room. One—the Arch of Titus—was very striking with the old antiquities.

SENATUS. POPULUSQUE ROMANUM.
(The Senate and People of Rome.)
DIVO. TITI. DIVI. VESPASIANI. DIVI. FILIVS. VESPASIAN. AVGVST.
(To Divine Titus, son of the Divine Vespasian, Vespasian being Emperor.)

Titus is seen in a triumphal car, followed by Jews, whose hands are tied behind their backs—while golden radiantes and other things brought from the Temple of Jerusalem, are sculptured on the walls. There are three hundred churches in Rome, and visitors have to see fifty of them, if they wish to view the paintings of Raphael and Michael Angelo, and the paintings and statues by the great artists and masters. Many of these were described, and it was shown that some of the statues now in St. Peter's and other churches, said to be statues of the Saints—were anciently heathen images. Several of the relics were severely commented on—such as "feathers from the wing of Gabriel"—"a platter (at Genoa) which held the head of John the Baptist"—&c., &c. But such things are more worthy of the dark ages than the 19th century—and therefore we will not dwell upon them.

The population of Naples is nearly half a million. It is beautifully situated on the celebrated Bay, which is nearly twelve miles in diameter. The burning mountain of Vesuvius was a grand object from Naples—and the ruins of Herculaneum and Pompeii, were objects of deep interest to travellers. The city of Pompeii was buried in ashes, at the same time that Herculaneum was overwhelmed with fery lava. The grave-yards, as found in the ruins, were located on the roads entering the city. In such a situation there is some propriety in using the words—"State' venire."

The lecturer visited some of the long buried cities were ably described. The houses were one and two stories high, and with flat roofs generally—built in squares or parallelograms—generally a colonnade round the interior—the first court paved with marble. Beyond the first court and receiving-room, there was an interior, called the domus (dwelling for the family.) In Naples, at the Museum, there may be seen enough of ancient utensils, relics, domestic articles—many as now—bracelets, mirrors of polished steel, combs—large ones for the back of the head, and small ones for the nodes, as now used by ladies—bottles of essences, pots of pomatum, and other things—enough to occupy several weeks. In some of the ancient apartments skeletons had been found—one of a man who had probably gone back to save his money, which was found in his hand. Things found in the Temple of Isis, prove everything that Justin Martyr and other Christian writers charged upon the Pagans. In one room the representations were so abominable, that it was not shown. The Temples of Pæstum were built by the Greeks. In concluding, Dr. B. expressed a hope that England and France would prevent Austria from overthrowing the Government of Rome—and he was quite sure that Italy was becoming gradually prepared for a better state of things.

PATRICK HENRY.—Patrick Henry is a prominent example that Greek and Latin alone do not form the man; that true greatness is native in the man, not dependent upon external conditions. At twelve years of age he was an idle fishing boy—at fifteen a clerk in a counting-house—at twenty honestly delving the dusty earth with his own hands to obtain a livelihood—at twenty-four a bankrupt merchant—at twenty-seven suddenly burstinn obscurity into a rich popularity, by a bold, noble, and astonishing display of those mammoth powers of mind, which had so long remained shrouded in darkness by the mantle of his own sublime contemplation—at forty the first orator in America, and, in the language of Thomas Jefferson, "the greatest orator that ever lived."

MATERIAL FOR REFORMING.—The New York Commercial, speaking of the material in that city, for epidemics, says, after a run through the town:

"We will not say, as Coleridge did on the occasion of his visit to Cologne, that seventy-seven distinct stenches could be recognized; but every corner certainly has its stench, and the spaces between are not unprovided."

REASON.—"Father," said a little boy, "what are friends?"

"People who come to you in distress and relieve you," was the reply.

"Yes, I remember," said the boy, "when the horse was dying in yonder field, a heap of big black-birds hovered around him. They were friends, I suppose."

United States SATURDAY POST.

HENRY PETERSON, EDITOR.

Philadelphia:
SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1849.

ALL THE CONTENTS OF THE POST ARE SET UP EXPRESSLY FOR IT, AND IT ALONE. IT IS NOT A MERE REPRINT OF A DAILY PAPER.

TO POSTMASTERS.

We trust our old friends, the Postmasters, will exert themselves and get up large clubs for the mammoth Post; or if they do not feel inclined to take advantage of our liberal offers themselves, that they will show our Prospectus to some other influential and responsible person who will be willing to do so. We think there need be no great difficulty in getting subscribers to the enlarged paper, as those who will take the trouble to compare it with the other weekly papers, cannot fail to perceive that it outshines all competition. Let it be remembered, also, that the postage is just the same on a first class paper, as on the second and poorest of the small reprints.

NOTICE.

Subscribers wishing their paper changed, will please give the name of the Post Office to be changed from, as well as the Post Office they wish it hereafter sent to.

All persons addressing letters to us should be careful to give the name of the State as well as of the town in which they live.

Post Masters or others sending for a club, would confer a favor by having them sent to one address when they can do so conveniently.

ISABEL DENISON.

A STORY OF THE HEART.

We begin this week a story that we think will prove very interesting to our readers. The conduct of the heroine will probably be a subject of much discussion—some censuring, while others will justify it as the only right course under the circumstances. The result of such discussions will be we think the forming of correct opinions upon the important subject to which they relate. But we forget that we are writing in advance of our readers. The story increases in interest with every step of its progress.

"Isabel Denison" is about the usual length of our "continued" stories—perhaps somewhat longer. We shall print an extra supply of the first numbers, in order to accommodate those who may wish to embrace the present favorable opportunity for subscribing—but it would be well for those who desire this tale, to send on their names as soon as possible.

THE FOREIGN NEWS.

The political news by the Caledonia is of greater importance than that which we have had for some time past. Contrary to general expectation, the French have sustained a reverse under the walls of Rome, and General Oudinot has been compelled to fall back and wait for reinforcements. In the meantime, the Austrians, (invited by Count Pulszky and the Neopolitans, are marching upon Rome—the triumvirs of which have threatened, in case of defeat, to blow up the proudest monuments of its greatness, and leave nothing but a heap of blackened ruins behind them, to grace the triumph of despotism.

The truly Republican portion of the French Assembly are indignant at the conduct of the Government in relation to Italy. They say that the mission of Gen. Oudinot was avowed to be one for the "purpose, not for the destruction, of the liberties of the Romans." It was right, if it was right at all, to send to interpose between Austria and Naples, and their prey—but the French Army has attempted to be itself a destroyer, instead of a saviour. A motion introduced into the Assembly, "that the republic sees in Italy the best and most longer tried ally of the rest of Europe," passed by a majority of 328 to 241. It was also contended, and apparently with justice, by some of the speakers, that the Government had violated the Constitution by its course—for its original title of which instrument declares "that the French Republic respects foreign nationalities, as it desires that its own should be respected, and will undertake no war with a view to conquest, nor employ its forces against any people." Fifty-six members signed a project of impeachment of the President and Ministry.

A letter of Louis Napoleon to General Oudinot, in which he condoles with him upon his defeat, and promises reinforcements, is much commented upon by the newspapers—the Republican journals asserting that his power does not extend to the performance of such a promise, it being his prerogative only in conjunction with his ministry.

The eventual triumph of the French over the Romans, is of course an event that may be counted upon with certainty. But the moral effect of the repulse will be very unfavorable to the success of their cause. It has demonstrated that Rome is not "disorganized," but that the Republic possesses a fair amount of strength. It is only just to say, however, that of the prisoners taken by the French, many might be seen to make, to the Gallic martial ardor, frank, being Frenchmen, and those peals of tyranny the world over, the gallant Poles.

Turning to Austria and Hungary, we find that fortune still favors the latter. 150,000 Russian troops are said to be on their march to assist the Austrians. Kossuth, however, is not alarmed at the report, Heaven grant it may be true! that England and France are determined to interfere, and have notified the Czar that they will not look on quietly, and see Hungary, like another Poland, borne down by the mere weight of his barbaric hordes. Eternal shame will rest upon those two leading liberal powers of Europe, if they allow chivalrous and high spirited Hungary—the ancient defender of Europe against the Moslem—to be blotted out of the map of Europe, or attached as a mere provincial province to either of its powerful assailants.

In Germany, all is again quiet and insurrection, as the last news indicated would be the case. The Constitution promulgated by the Frankfort Assembly, is so much like that of Prussia, that it is a Constitution, has taken deep hold of the popular mind. Thirty one German States have declared for it—and in the other States, the people are for it, and seem determined to force their rulers to give their assent. If Prussia does not recognize the Constitution, the sovereign of the largest State among those represented, is to be Emperor of Germany. So strong appears to be the popular desire for German Unity, for a federative system, that it is only reasonable to suppose that it will ultimately prevail.

The Sicilians have finally submitted, we believe unconditionally, to the Neapolitans. A mortifying ending to a good beginning.

THE CHOLERA.

As a report has been spread by one of the New York papers that the Cholera exists in Philadelphia, we think it right to state that up to the time of our going to press, not a single case has occurred. The authorities are taking energetic measures to secure a perfectly clean city during the Summer months, and we therefore have reason to hope that if the Cholera reaches us at all, it will be very light.

In Cincinnati the Cholera is gradually disappearing. In Louisville the Board of Health reports that it has entirely disappeared. In St. Louis it still continues. The California emigrants, and the Mormons at Council Bluff, are said to be suffering severely from it.

We commend the following paragraph from the Louisville Journal to the attention of all:

A striking illustration that cleanliness is a sure preventive for cholera, is that in the square on Fifth street, between Market and Market, not a case of cholera has occurred, although in the neighborhood the disease committed its worst ravages.

AMERICANS IN ENGLAND.

The "New York Albion," in allusion to the efforts made by some to make the Forrest and Macready controversy a national affair, gives the following list of American now being received with high consideration in England:—Miss Cushman, Mrs. Mowatt and Mr. Davenport, players; Mr. Bennett and Professor Bailey, exhibitors of Panoramas; and Mr. Catlin, possessor of the Gallery of Indian portraits. The Albion adds:

"Mr. Alfred Street, the poet, also finds there a publisher."

The strikes are so indeed "capping the climax."

ELECTRIC LIGHT.

Daguerreotypes have been produced in Dublin by making use of the Electric Light in place of the sun's rays—the marked fidelity of outline, with the depth and delicacy of shade, elicited the highest admiration. After the complete success of the experiment in that respect had been established, a new test of the power of the Electric Light was essayed—namely, the preparation of the plate on which the portrait is fixed. In this novel and ingenious application the utmost success also rewarded the efforts of the experimentalists.

DR. COOLIDGE.

This depraved man did not take poison, as was first reported, but died from very deep or the detection of his last infamous scheme of murder.

A post mortem examination revealed the rather curious fact that "his heart was excessively small, weighing only nine and a quarter ounces." The coincidence between this fact, and the want of nobleness, benevolence, &c., in the character of the man, is, to say the least, somewhat remarkable.

HUNGARY.

The present war between Hungary and Austria, appears to have had its origin in the reactionary movement against Constitutional Liberty, which is now being urged on by the Emperor of the latter, and, to forward which movement, the streets of Vienna were deluged with blood.

Hungary has never been a province of Austria, as many suppose, but has been for nine centuries an independent kingdom. Her connection with Austria was simply this—the Emperor of Austria was King of Hungary. Ferdinand, an Emperor of Austria, and not the smallest particle of right to claim allegiance of the Hungarians—the Ministers of Austria were never acknowledged as Ministers of Hungary. Hungary had its separate Constitution—one of seven centuries standing—its separate legislative body—its separate ministry. The two countries were as distinct and independent as Hanover and Great Britain, though the King of Great Britain was Elector of Hanover.

When the Emperor of Austria was forced by his people to promulgate a Constitution, containing various liberal provisions, corresponding changes were made by Hungary. In Hungary, however, these changes were the work not of the Emperor by his authority as King, but owed their origin to the regular legislative power. While the neighboring nations were in a revolutionary ferment, Hungary was comparatively tranquil. But there were great changes demanded by popular sentiment, and it was not only the part of wisdom but of safety to make them. By the old laws, no man who was not of noble birth, could vote at the elections; while the very class that had no votes, was compelled to bear the whole burden of taxation—the nobles, who owned the greater part of the property, paying no taxes. Thus it would often be the case that of two men of equal property, and been villeins of the soil, would have noble blood in his veins and vote, and pay no taxes, while the other would be forced to pay taxes, and yet be restricted from the exercise of the right of suffrage. It was only natural that in such a state of things, the peasantry would be prominent in the Anti-Austrian movement against the Hungarians. Thus the old tyrant maxim of "divide and conquer," was attempted to be put in practice against Hungary; thus far, fortunately, with but little success.

Even while the Emperor of Austria was thus secretly tormenting a Croatian insurrection, he pretended to keep good faith with Hungary. He declared in advance of any request from all the nations—but, as the Sun paid no attention to the supposition, he doubtless had private commands to disregard it. The Archduke Palatine, the Emperor's representative in Hungary, declared to the Diet that his majesty the King had seen the result of Croat insurrection, and had regretted it, and was well satisfied that Hungary had not joined, Heaven grant it may be true! that England and France are determined to interfere, and have notified the Czar that they will not look on quietly, and see Hungary, like another Poland, borne down by the mere weight of his barbaric hordes. Eternal shame will rest upon those two leading liberal powers of Europe, if they allow chivalrous and high spirited Hungary—the ancient defender of Europe against the Moslem—to be blotted out of the map of Europe, or attached as a mere provincial province to either of its powerful assailants.

In Germany, all is again quiet and insurrection, as the last news indicated would be the case. The Constitution promulgated by the Frankfort Assembly, is so much like that of Prussia, that it is a Constitution, has taken deep hold of the popular mind. Thirty one German States have declared for it—and in the other States, the people are for it, and seem determined to force their rulers to give their assent. If Prussia does not recognize the Constitution, the sovereign of the largest State among those represented, is to be Emperor of Germany. So strong appears to be the popular desire for German Unity, for a federative system, that it is only reasonable to suppose that it will ultimately prevail.

The Sicilians have finally submitted, we believe unconditionally, to the Neapolitans. A mortifying ending to a good beginning.

THE CHOLERA.

As a report has been spread by one of the New York papers that the Cholera exists in Philadelphia, we think it right to state that up to the time of our going to press, not a single case has occurred. The authorities are taking energetic measures to secure a perfectly clean city during the Summer months, and we therefore have reason to hope that if the Cholera reaches us at all, it will be very light.

In Cincinnati the Cholera is gradually disappearing. In Louisville the Board of Health reports that it has entirely disappeared. In St. Louis it still continues. The California emigrants, and the Mormons at Council Bluff, are said to be suffering severely from it.

We commend the following paragraph from the Louisville Journal to the attention of all:

A striking illustration that cleanliness is a sure preventive for cholera, is that in the square on Fifth street, between Market and Market, not a case of cholera has occurred, although in the neighborhood the disease committed its worst ravages.

AMERICANS IN ENGLAND.

The "New York Albion," in allusion to the efforts made by some to make the Forrest and Macready controversy a national affair, gives the following list of American now being received with high consideration in England:—Miss Cushman, Mrs. Mowatt and Mr. Davenport, players; Mr. Bennett and Professor Bailey, exhibitors of Panoramas; and Mr. Catlin, possessor of the Gallery of Indian portraits. The Albion adds:

"Mr. Alfred Street, the poet, also finds there a publisher."

The strikes are so indeed "capping the climax."

ELECTRIC LIGHT.

Daguerreotypes have been produced in Dublin by making use of the Electric Light in place of the sun's rays—the marked fidelity of outline, with the depth and delicacy of shade, elicited the highest admiration. After the complete success of the experiment in that respect had been established, a new test of the power of the Electric Light was essayed—namely, the preparation of the plate on which the portrait is fixed. In this novel and ingenious application the utmost success also rewarded the efforts of the experimentalists.

DR. COOLIDGE.

This depraved man did not take poison, as was first reported, but died from very despair at the detection of his last infamous scheme of murder.

A post mortem examination revealed the rather curious fact that "his heart was excessively small, weighing only nine and a quarter ounces." The coincidence between this fact, and the want of nobleness, benevolence, &c., in the character of the man, is, to say the least, somewhat remarkable.

ACADEMY OF FINE ARTS.

There is much that is beautiful and well worth visiting in the Academy this year, but the department that most interests us is the sculpture room. It is occupied chiefly by the noble works of Steinhauser, which far surpass anything of the kind that has been seen in America. Mr. Hazo and Lender, considered by good judges the best masterpieces, we have before spoken of in terms of warm admiration, which our second visit tempts us to repeat. "A thing of beauty is a joy forever." We congratulate the Academy upon the possession of this matchless group, and our fellow citizens upon the opportunity they now have of seeing it frequently and renewing in their souls the refining influence of a work of art so noble and so pure.

The Shell Girl is an exquisite creation,—one to gaze upon with unqualified delight and ever-growing admiration. It represents a young and very lovely girl who has been gathering shells upon the shore, and is holding one up to her ear, listening intently to its murmured music. Her face, which is very delicate and beautiful in its outline, has an absorbed and dreamy look. The expression of an abstracted listener, wholly rapt from outward things, and revelling with a quiet joy in the sweet visions of fancy, is wonderfully perfect. In this figure we see the same faultless symmetry of the limbs with which we are charmed in all the productions of Steinhauser. The Little Peasant, displayed that holds up the shells in her robe, looks soft and graceful as if the tide of life from a gentle heart flowed through its dainty veins.

The Infant Christ is also a beautiful creation. At the first glance it charms us as the perfection of human childhood, but soon we see in the face which is lifted heavenward an expression more holy and tender than would be natural to the simple children of men. On the lips, too, there is a smile of celestial happiness, as if he looked unbidden upon the face of the Father, without one earthly shadow between. Not yet upon that heart of love has descended the burden of our sorrows—the heavier burden of our sins. The blessedness of innocence enfolds him, and its sovereign power within him bears up the soul of the little child above the darkness and the taint of evil. His sinless head is leaned against the cross, which one sort arm embraces, while the little children foot is planted unconsciously upon the head of the serpent, the dread foe of man, the symbol of all earthly crime and woe. Oh, that the beautiful lesson that sinks into our hearts as we gaze, could remain forever there to guide us through the tumult and temptation of life! Clinging steadfastly to the cross, and looking up to God with child-like simplicness and purity of heart, how simple and easy would be our triumph over the awful Power of Evil!

PEACE.

We have received an Address from the Peace Congress Committee in London, to the friends of peace in the United States, giving information that it has been resolved to hold a second annual World's Congress or Convention of the friends of Peace, at Paris, in the month of August next. Perhaps we could not better serve the object in view, than by the publication of the following extract from the Address:

As far as we can see at present, all things augur well for the success of such a Congress. Mr. de Lamartine in France, and Mr. Cobden in England, have already signified their adhesion to the movement, and it is scarcely to be doubted that many of the leading minds of Europe will dignify it by their presence and aid in its deliberations. We are encouraged, moreover, that the great revolutions which have recently shaken the continent of Europe, and which may at first sight seem to render such a convention premature, will, on the contrary, contributed to make this an epoch pre-eminently favorable to our object. The attempt to propagate Peace principles, at a time when the public mind of Europe, like sawing the seed by the way-side—ground which had been trodden into hopeless obduracy by the hoofs of the war-horse, and the national prejudice for many generations. But the old hardened surface of European society has been torn up by the late scenes and events, and a fresh, and a fresh virgin soil thrown out, full of a robust and teeming fertility, which it behooves us, ere it be occupied by a rank, and, in many cases, a noxious growth, to have thoroughly impregnated with the seeds of human brotherhood, benevolence and peace.

We do not, however, contend that even you, dear friends, that the full success of this demonstration will depend, in a very important degree, upon you and the British public of America. To each, in the level of an object and of an occasion so great, it must be emphatically a Congress of the people, and a Congress in which, as part of our minds are formerly, will be less surprised at the chaotic manner in which they have repulsed the American invasion.

The cause of this invasion, as we have said, was the reactionary spirit of the Emperor of Austria. He desired to crush, in Hungary, the Hungarians had so nobly done—but the Hungarians have not proved Vienneses. The first movement of the Emperor was to take advantage of the old Croatian jealousy of the Hungarians—a jealousy which could be extinguished only by the sacrifice of a very noble conduct towards Croatia as we have referred to—and Baron Joseph Jellachich, colonel of a Croat Regiment in the army of Italy, was selected as the instrument of the Austrian Court. Jellachich was named Ban of Croatia, without consulting the Hungarian Ministry, whose assent was necessary to legalize the nomination, and immediately instigated a Sclavonic movement against the Hungarians. Thus the old tyrant maxim of "divide and conquer," was attempted to be put in practice against Hungary; thus far, fortunately, with but little success.

Even while the Emperor of Austria was thus secretly tormenting a Croatian insurrection, he pretended to keep good faith with Hungary. He declared in advance of any request from all the nations—but, as the Sun paid no attention to the supposition, he doubtless had private commands to disregard it. The Archduke Palatine, the Emperor's representative in Hungary, declared to the Diet that his majesty the King had seen the result of Croat insurrection, and had regretted it, and was well satisfied that Hungary had not joined, Heaven grant it may be true! that England and France are determined to interfere, and have notified the Czar that they will not look on quietly, and see Hungary, like another Poland, borne down by the mere weight of his barbaric hordes. Eternal shame will rest upon those two leading liberal powers of Europe, if they allow chivalrous and high spirited Hungary—the ancient defender of Europe against the Moslem—to be blotted out of the map of Europe, or attached as a mere provincial province to either of its powerful assailants.

In Germany, all is again quiet and insurrection, as the last news indicated would be the case. The Constitution promulgated by the Frankfort Assembly, is so much like that of Prussia, that it is a Constitution, has taken deep hold of the popular mind. Thirty one German States have declared for it—and in the other States, the people are for it, and seem determined to force their rulers to give their assent. If Prussia does not recognize the Constitution, the sovereign of the largest State among those represented, is to be Emperor of Germany. So strong appears to be the popular desire for German Unity, for a federative system, that it is only reasonable to suppose that it will ultimately prevail.

The Sicilians have finally submitted, we believe unconditionally, to the Neapolitans. A mortifying ending to a good beginning.

INDIAN GRATITUDE.

Mrs. Eastman, author of a recent work called "Dahcotah, or Lances and Legends of the Sioux" around Fort Snelling:—an extract from which we give on our fourth page—tells the following anecdote of the mode in which an Indian Chief desired to show his gratitude to her for the interest she took in his character. She says:—"He told me he had three wives, all of whom he would give up if I would leave Eastman and come and live with him." I received his proposition, however, with Indian indifference, merely replying that I did not fancy having my head split open every few days with a stick of wood. He laughed heartily at his Dahcotah conscience that the sap filled, for he was in the habit of expending all his surplus bad temper upon his wives."

FRANCE.

The following are said to be among the benefits already conferred by a Republican form of Government on France—they are cogent arguments against a return to monarchy:

The establishment of railroads, the economy of the Government, the reduction of postage, the cheapness of salt, the development of primary education, the diminished price of journals and books, the improvement of the Departmental Councils, and five hundred improvements, in short, of which the monarchy never dreamed."

THE LEHIGH STRIKE.

What is Governor Johnston about that he does not see the laws faithfully executed on the Lehigh? The boatmen have a perfect right to strike, if they are not violating engagements deliberately entered into, but they have no right to use physical force to prevent those from running who do not see the good policy of the strike. We ask again, why does not Governor Johnston, if the power of the local authorities is not sufficient, see that the laws are faithfully executed?

A LARGE REWARD.

Twenty thousand pounds sterling ($100,000,) is the reward offered by the British Government to any ship or ships, of any country, or to any exploring party whatever, who shall render efficient assistance to the missing vessels of Sir John Franklin's expedition, or to their crews, or any portion of them. Will not some Yankee whaler pick up a little California!

CANADA.

The Seat of Government of Canada has been removed from Montreal to Quebec and Toronto, on account of the recent riot at the first mentioned city. The Legislature will meet four times at Quebec and four at Toronto alternately. This will teach the Montreal people the value, even in a monetary sense, of good order.

GIRARD COLLEGE.

A New Orleans paper says that Girard College "is decidedly the finest and most splendid building in the United States, and far superior to the Capitol at Washington."

TALK WITH SUBSCRIBERS.

Our thanks are due this week for an increase of one: to friends in Salisbury, and Cleveland, Ohio; New Cumberland, Sewickly, Strasburg, and Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania; Middleton, Mississippi; Harper's Ferry, and Manchester, Virginia; Quercus Grove, and Independence, Indiana; Marshall, and Columbus, Texas; Sycamore Mills, Tennessee; Vincentown, New Jersey; Dubuque, Iowa; Marion, Georgia; Stone Mills, New York; Keytesville, Missouri; Columbiana, Alabama; and Robin, Kentucky.

Also for a second increase to friends in Plainfield, New Jersey; Gettipolis, and Ohio City, Ohio; and West Bloomfield, and Alabama, New York. Also for a third increase to friends in Jerseyville, Illinois; and for a fourth increase to friends in Pembroke, Tennessee. Also for entirely new lists to Upton, Pond, Elbridge, New York; and Harlingen, New Jersey. Also to old friends at a great number of places for renewals of their subscriptions, and payments of old accounts.

GERMANY.

The latest advices from Germany state that the King of Hanover has been forced to fly from his dominions—having previously declined an offer of Prussia to send troops to his assistance.

The insurrection in Saxony has been for the time put down.

Along the Rhine, the people were in a most excited state—throughout the Rhine provinces the armed militia are said to be dissatisfied towards the King of Prussia, and favorable to the Frankfort Assembly and its Constitution.

Prussia has called out the whole of its Landwehr, which, with the regular army, is said to constitute a force of 500,000 men. It is reported, however, that the Landwehr of several of these provinces hitherto reputed most loyal, cannot be depended on. The soldiers are said to have refused protection to those Princes of Germany who reject the Frankfort Constitution, from their indignant people.

GOLD IN GEORGIA.

A lump of gold, worth nearly fifteen hundred dollars, was picked up the other day at a mine near Dalton, Georgia, by a poor laborer. Another lump, not larger, has been found at the same place. It is singular how much gold has been discovered, in various places, since the California

United States SATURDAY POST.

Philadelphia:

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1849.

CALIFORNIA.

Numerous letters have been received of late from California, all speaking the same glowing language as to the abundance of gold, the ease with which it can be obtained, the high price of lots in San Francisco, the expense of living, &c. We give the following as samples. A merchant of San Francisco, writing under date of March 9th, among other things has the following:

"It appears that in all the great extent of the placers, there is scarcely a point where gold is not found, and there are places where a bushel of earth yields a pound of gold. In this part the circulation of money is astonishing. All things are high, but principally transportation and manual labor."

A letter dated March 9th, from Mr. Thibault, formerly of New Orleans, to his brother Francis F. Thibault, of the firm of Dubosq, Carrow & Co., New Orleans, says:

"In nearest man in this place earns show from $500 to $1,500 in gold dust, that he has gathered by his own hands in a month or so. Some have found in three months' time as much as $10,000 to $20,000, but they have been fortunate. No one, with the least labor, finds less than $15 to $20 per day; and by persevering and the least good luck, one may find from $50 to $100. This is truth. I could tell you of names of persons innumerable, who, eight months ago, were not worth $100, who are now worth $100,000. Some, by good speculation, have amassed from one to two millions in that space of time. There are not many of the latter, but there are some instances."

The New York Tribune adds the following:

THE GOLD COMING.—Col. D. Griffin, of 192 Broadway, has shown us a letter from Mr. F. C. Whitten, dated "City of Mexico, April 15," in which we find the following additional testimony that the California gold is coming this way.

"There are three men here on their way home from California, each with two hundred thousand dollars' worth of gold with them, which they have made in one year, and which they showed us. The men are they being in better than ever, and our spirits are first rate, and our courage equal to anything that may come. Two at three of our party have had the fever and ague, and I have been doctoring them with the Tonic mixture, which cures them right off. There is money enough to be made there, if a man has sufficient capital.

That last clause about having "sufficient capital," is rather hard to understand. If "the poorest man can show $500 to $1,500, the product of the labor of a month or so," we do not see why any one may not soon procure a reasonable sufficiency of capital.

The following is an extract from a letter published in a Mobile paper. It is written by Peter H. Burnett, Esq., and is addressed to Colonel Dunnigan:

SUTER'S FORT, UPPER CALIFORNIA, February 2, 1849.

COL. A. W. DUNNIGAN:—I am here at this point, but not been attracted hither by the unlimited gold region of California.

* * *

Men are here nearly crazy with the riches forced suddenly into their pockets.

* * *

Colonel, you have been through Mexico and elsewhere, but you never saw anything like the state of affairs here. The accounts you have seen of the gold region are not overcolored. About $5 per day is the amount of the produce of one hand. I saw in the mines forty days, and was satisfied to make an accurate estimate. The gold is positively inexhaustible. One hundred millions will be taken out annually for many years to come. Town lots at San Francisco are worth $10,000 for the best, and no title at that.

PETER H. BURNETT.

The California steamships on their return they have at length arrived at Panama. The New York Herald says, "It is expected that they have to the value of over half a million of dollars on freight, destined for houses in this city." We trust that those who are exporting that half million may not be disappointed. It will be amusing to remove the incredulity of a very large number of people—people who walk not so much in this matter by faith as by sight—as to the abundance of the precious metals in California.

AFFECTING INCIDENT.

A correspondent of the Tribune furnishes the following incident of the wreck of the steamer Empire:

After the Empire was struck, and while sinking, two mothers snatched what they supposed to be their own infants, and rushed upon deck, and in their flight threw themselves into the water. One of the devoted parents held the child to her bosom, and both were saved; while the other sustained her child at breakfast the last, still holding to the body until she was rescued. The surprise of the mothers may be imagined when they discovered that in the confusion attending their escape they had each taken the other's child. And while the poor mother who had lost her own child, no one was lost present to her bosom her own babe, the other was frantic with grief to find too late that she had preserved another's child and lost her own.

ST. LOUIS.

St. Louis is already beginning to revive from the effects of the great fire, the loss of which is now stated at under two millions of dollars.

All the sufferers, we understand, except two, will be able to meet their responsibilities—these two will pay from fifty to seventy-five per cent.

So far the loss of life is not so great as was apprehended.

The city has passed an ordinance requiring that the streets in the Business District be widened, and that the buildings to be erected must be fire proof.

BIRTHS OF HEALTH.—The number of deaths during the last week in this city was 137—adults 77, and children 61.

The Penal Code.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

The subject of Capital Punishments has been recently talked elaborately discussed in the British House of Commons, and the Times of Friday, from the military statistical statements made by Mr. Ewart and Sir George Grey, to advocate whether the abolition of the punishment of death for all offenses excepting that of murder, has had a tendency to diminish crime or to increase it. The sum and substance of the debate may be thus rendered, in the shape of a dialogue:

Mr. Ewart.—The number of murders has lately increased in a most alarming degree; it is quite evident that Capital Punishment has not checked that crime.

Sir G. Grey.—On the contrary, if we take a series of years we shall find that murder is the only crime which has not very materially increased. The terror of death throws a protection around human life and deters from the commission of murder. In the ten years ending 1848, there were 37 commitments for murder annually, and the sum average actual, for the preceding fifteen years. The commitments for murder in 1844, 1845, 1847, and 1848, were 21, 19, 18, 19, and 22, respectively. I have no reason to suppose that those for the present year will exceed, possibly not even equal, those of 1848.

Mr. Ewart.—The right honorable Baronet asserted last year that in reference to "attempts to murder there had been an increase in the five years ending with 1846, as compared with the five years ending in 1831, from 431 to 1,022; and there had also been an increase in cases of rape, arson, and forgery, in respect to all which crimes Capital Punishment had been abolished." Now, taking the seventeen fatal, I venture to doubt the fact. But, if it were so, there are only four out of the twenty or more for the commission of which Capital Punishment has been abolished, and I am prepared to show that, in the majority of those crimes, the number of cases had diminished with the abolition of Capital Punishment for their commital. In respect to the alleged increase in "attempts to commit murder," certain acts are previously classed among such offences but been treated as such since the abolition of the punishment of death upon conviction, and thus the apparent amount of those crimes had been swollen since that period. It was no doubt true that the number of convictions for rape had increased since death had ceased to be the punishment for that outrage; but it was also true that before the abolition in the twenty of the injured parties had refrained from prosecution of the minor offence. It was a very satisfactory proof of the improvement of the moral consciousness of the people in the proportion of five to one. Thus the certainty of punishment had been increased; there was no proof of the increase of crime, but only an increase in the number of prosecutions for its commital. With respect to wilful arson even the statistics furnished by Sir G. Grey, showed a very considerable diminution of crime in the first six years following the abolition of Capital Punishment. In regard to forgery, it appeared that the commitals for that offence, for the five years preceding 1836, were 250; these increased during the five years after the alteration in the law to 264, and in five years later to 731. Now it would be found that under the old system of punishment all such forgeries as were not Capital were omitted in the returns, but they now were included. Let the returns for the present time be made out on the same principle as they were formerly, and it would be found that crime had materially diminished with the diminution of Capital Punishment.

Sir G. Grey.—Notwithstanding all that my honorable friend has said in relation to the uncertainties of my figures at last year, I am bound to adhere substantially to the statement which I then made, and to say that crime under all the heads to which he has alluded has increased since the abolition of Capital Punishment.

Mr. Ewart maintained that the onus lay upon the Government to prove that they could not do without executions in cases of murder; but he was in a condition to show that they could, and to prove by returns that the experiment of the abolition of Capital Punishment had been a successful experiment, as far as it had gone, and ought to be carried further. To say that the community felt that a murderer deserved death, was to substitute feeling for reason; the Government were bound to prove a case of legislative expediency for Capital Punishment in case of murder. (The honorable member stated some comparisons of different periods to show that the number of murders decreased, or not, and where the number of executions decreased.) He proposed to substitute a certain for an uncertain punishment—for Capital Punishment must always be an uncertain one, unless executions were to follow in every case. Considerable sensation and some indignation had lately been caused by the execution of two persons who at crimes seemed greatly to differ—the unfortunate woman executed at Bristol, and the infamous criminal recently executed at Norwich. The spectacle, and the published account of executions, also were hurtful to public morals, and led a morbid interest in Capital crime. Capital Punishment produced a reactionary feeling in the minds of the public, diverting their attention from the magnitude of the crime to that of the punishment; and also in the minds of criminals, turning their thoughts from the date of repentance. Capital Punishment had the extraordinary quality, that it imitated the crime against which it was directed. One if inflicted, too, it could not be recalled; mistake could not be compensated. The abolition of Capital Punishment, whether tried in ancient Rome or in modern Europe, had been attended with success. The principle he advocated was gaining a hold on the people of this country, and the Legislature would certainly have to purge the statute book of this law.

Sir G. Grey said, in reply:—"My honorable friend has reserved his strongest argument to the last, viz.: the evils arising from public executions. I quite agree with him that those evils are very great. [Hear, hear.] Nothing is more to be deplored or counsel than the desire exhibited by multitudes, and the facilities given them, for more necessary gain, to gratify their most depraved taste—to witness the last dying agonies of a fellow creature suffering the extreme penalty of the law. [Hear, hear.] This is an evil which all should seek to check; but, some thirty years ago, when a bill was brought forward to modify the system of executions, some prophesied more against that measure than my honorable friend. No doubt there must ever be a strong feeling against any proposal for introducing private executions, seeing it would be regarded as lately to perpetuate the system of punishment—and yet my honorable friend has made the evils arising from public executions his strongest argument. On this point I can say no more than that I entirely concur with him in the concern he has cast upon the scenes attending public executions; but that a public execution is not necessary is shown from the experience of foreign countries. If that question comes before the House to be discussed on its merits, I shall be prepared to give my opinion; but I warn the House against supposing that it is necessary to the maintenance of Capital Punishments to have them public, and, therefore, the arguments of my honorable friend have no direct bearing on that question. [Hear, hear.] Looking at what I had said, on a former occasion, I cannot think I can address no new arguments to the House. I will only express the hope that the House will not allow my honorable friend even to lay his bill on the table. [hear, hear.] that you will not by any hesitation raise in people's minds expectations that can only lead to great disappointment, and that the opinion of the House will be so firmly and decidedly expressed as to leave on the public mind no doubt whatever as to the views entertained on this question."

As we do not regard the subject of Capital Punishment as merely an English question, but as one in which the universal family of man is interested, we have ventured to extend our comments upon this debate between two very able and good men, who are decidedly of the same school of politics, but who have arrived at diametrically opposite conclusions upon this question, although they have dwelled their arguments from the same "facts and figures." The debate was continued by Mr. Bright, Mr. Brotherton, and Lord Nugent, in favor of the abolition of Capital Punishment, and by Mr. Drummond, Sir F. Baring, and Sir Henry Verney against it. On a division, fifty one members voted for Mr. Ewart's motion, and seventy-five against it.—National Intelligencer.

☞ A Pacific Railroad Convention is to be held at Memphis, Tenn., on the 4th of July next. Invitations have been sent to the various cities and towns throughout the Union to send delegates.

Religious News.

AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS

The following is a summary of the Report of the Board, read at the recent anniversary meeting in this city, in the First Presbyterian Church:

The Board has now under its care 21 Missions, embracing 96 stations, placed in many of the most important centres of political, commercial and religious influence throughout the world. These Missions are conducted in Western and Southern Africa, Greece, Constantinople, Asia Minor, Syria, Persia, Western and Southern India, Ceylon, Siam, Borneo, China, Sandwich Islands, and amongst a number of Indian tribes, scattered through the Oregon Territory, Indian Territory West and Northwest of the United States, in the State of New York, and in Lower Canada. At the annual meeting of the Board in September last, the number of Missionaries and Assistants reported, was 350, since which time 1 (Missionaries, will their wives, have been sent out, in all 70 persons, to join the Missions in Africa, in India, and in the Turkish Empire; which makes the aggregate of missionary laborers, now under the direction of the Board, and depending upon its treasury for support, 420.

Connected with these Missions are 72 churches, with nearly 20,000 communicants, 1,818 of whom were received to Christian fellowship during the year preceding the annual meeting of the Board in September last.

These Missions have 16 seminaries, for the training of native preachers and teachers, in which there are 260 scholars, 18 other boarding schools, in which there are 181 male and 508 female pupils, also 202 free schools, in which 10,116 children and youth are taught, making the total number in schools, or partly indirectly under the instruction of the Missionaries, 11,840. The common schools at the Sandwich Islands are not here included, as they are now supported by the government.

The printing establishments connected with the Missions are eleven in number. There are also seven type and stereotype foundries, and fonts of type for printing in nearly thirty languages.—18,172,351 pages were printed during the past year, making the whole number of pages, from the commencement of the Missions, 435,949,811.

The ordinary receipts up to May 1st, being nine months of the financial year, amount to $176,387, to which add $20,000, which have been paid into the treasury expressly to liquidate the debt of the Board, which, at the last annual meeting, was $60,000; and the aggregate receipts for the last nine months, are $197,387. The amount paid in, and what yet remains pledged expressly for the payment of the debt, is $46,000. To pay the debt, meet the current expenses, and free the treasury from embarrassment, an aggregate of $50,000 must be realized in the receipts for the remaining three months, May, June and July of the present financial year, or $16,666 per month.

Addresses were delivered by the Rev. Reuben Tinker, of Westfield, New York; Rev. John W. Hall, D. D., Rev. James H. C. Leach, D. D., and Rev. Artemas Bullard, D. D.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (New School).—Dr. Beecher, from the Special Committee to whom had been referred the memorials on the subject of slavery, made a report.

It recommended that the action of the former meetings of the General Assembly be adopted.—The resolutions accompanying the Report contained the following propositions, viz.:

1st—The right of man to civil liberty.

2nd—That slavery is sinful, unjust, and opposed to the interests of all concerned in it.

3rd—That it is the duty of Christians to use all righteous endeavors to effect the extirpation of the evil.

4th—Christians are enjoined to abstain from buying and selling slaves, unless severity to them, or the separation of the members of families, by any act of theirs.

5th—That the Assembly does not recognize the participation of any member in the evils alluded to, but if there is any, the attention of the proper judicatories is called to the case.

The Report was submitted to the Assembly, and appeared to give pretty general satisfaction.

The Rev. Dr. Leach, of Va., moved its acceptance and adoption.

While the discussion was pending, the Reverend Mr. Bassett, of Illinois, offered the following amendment:

"That state holding in a great sin before God and man, and should be treated by the Church in the same way as other gross immorals."

Mr. B. then delivered a length address against slavery, and in favor of the amendment. The vote being taken upon the amendment, it was lost. The Report of the Committee was then adopted.

A motion being offered relative to corresponding with the Old School Assembly, the matter was referred to a Committee of five, which is to report next year.

After the transaction of some further business of minor importance, the Assembly adjourned to meet again next year in Detroit.

MEETHODIST CHURCH SOUTH.—The Southern Christian Advocate gives the following interesting particulars of Southern Methodism:

There are nineteen Annual Conferences in the Church South, covering the Southern States and the Indian Territory. The general superintendence of the whole, is in the hands of four Bishops; the regular pastoral and missionary work is entrusted to the care of 1,816 travelling preachers, living an increase, during the past year, of 13.—The total number of supernumerary preachers is 108, and of local preachers 2,020, a decrease of 110, though some of the Conferences give no returns.

The total number of members is 491,796, viz.: White 354,528, colored 134,403, Indians 3,375, exhibiting upon the returns of last year, the large increase of 20,213. The Missionary collections of the past year are reported from sixteen of the nineteen Conferences, and amount to a little upwards of $65,000. Putting down the Conferences not reported, according to the returns of the previous year, the aggregate Missionary revenue will stand at about $67,000, an improvement of more than $4,000 upon last year's operations.

General News.

CHOLERA PREVENTIVE.

The following communication, found in the New Orleans Commercial Times, is said to be strictly true:—

"In the summer of 1832, when the Cholera spread all over Middle Tennessee, its course, from Nashville, (where it first made its appearance,) was South. The authorities of Columbia, a town forty-two miles south of Nashville, and containing about two thousand inhabitants, caused fresh lime to be placed at the door of every house, and the citizens were requested to spread it freely on their premises, in the gutter, and in all open lots where there was any stagnant water. It soon reached Franklin, nineteen miles south of Nashville, then Pulaski, thirty miles south of Columbia, where it was terrific, thence to Shelbyville, east of Columbia forty-five miles, where it was worse than at any other place in Tennessee; two miles north of Columbia, in the country it was very bad—nearly half the negroes and whites died on some plantations. In fact, it was all over the surrounding country. Not a case originated in town. The system of liming continued throughout the summer and fall, and it was found that the usual fall fevers were very light, as much so, that the custom of liming has been strictly adhered to annually ever since, and from a sickly town, it is now one of the healthiest in Tennessee."

CENT MANUFACTORIES.

Among the many curious establishments in this city, is one for manufacturing copper coin. The market is so glutted with copper that it has fallen in value far below what it is estimated to be worth as currency. The weight of copper coin is not increased or diminished at the United States Mint to correspond with the fluctuation in the commercial market, consequently private individuals can realize a profit, and yet make the cents of full weight and due purity. The manufactory in Farsyth Street makes smooth pennies and then sends them to Philadelphia to be stamped, after which they are sent to the principal cities of the United States. In this city the pawnbrokers purchase them, paying one dollar for 103 pennies, but the manufacturers would make a profit if they sold them as low as 100 for one dollar in silver. Not only the pawnbrokers but many other persons deal in these pennies, and there are thousands of dollars worth of them in circulation among bakers, milkmen, and grocers. The inflation of the currency from this source, though apparently trifling, causes in the aggregate a heavy tax on the poorer class of the community, who are obliged to buy in private rooms, or at some increase the weight of pennies and call in the old issue.—New Yorl Sun.

THE ENGLISH POOR.—Thirty millions of dollars are annually contributed by the People of England to feed their poor! More by six millions than the whole of the ordinary expenditures of our Government, on the Civil List, Navy, Army, &c. The number of persons relieved in England and Wales in 1844, was about two millions, one-eight of the entire population! One fact indicates some improvement. The poor rate in 1841 was thirteen shillings and a penny per head of the whole population, but in 1847 it fell to nine shillings and two-pence per head, and in 1847 to six shillings and eight pence—one-half less oppressive than in 1841.—National Era.

PRENOMENA.—A late Kilkenny paper contains the following:—"On Saturday evening week, an unusual darkness suddenly gathered around this city and vicinity, insomuch that we ourselves were obliged to have recourse to candle light in order to finish some writing on which we were engaged. A heavy shower fell at the time, but could not sufficiently account for the dense gloom which prevailed—but it is entirely explained by the fact, that the heavy rain drops of that shower were impregnated with some dark coloring matter, so that to the great dismay of the laundry women here, white clothes were actually stained when immersed in it."

NEW MODE OF REFUGE VESSELS.—S. Watts, Jr., of Hallowell, Maine, has invented a method of bending, reefing and furling the sale of vessels, by which four men can do the work can fuel or reef the sails in half the time it now takes twelve men with ease and despatch, in the most violent gales. All the top sails also can be reefed, and the remaining canvass furled, during the time usually required to reef a single sail. No men are sent aloft, and the danger to life, and the danger of loss of life, is entirely obviated. The oil to be used in the sails, renders obstinately to be dislodged, but keeps its hold from year to year—a truth cure—now an rheumatism, gray and rheumatic with years.

The chief, marking the elongated and elongating space in the accounts current of their dollars, begins to ask if they are dead or have gone to California. Now he begins to pike bills at them. They suddenly start up to the reality that they are in arrear, and, with a sudden jerk, from the bottom, pay up. They never dispute his bills—they know books tell better stories than mere remembrances. If the publisher has faith enough, or a long purse, and can live like a hibernating bear, he may sometimes wait. But, if he is a monthly, you, must be to him. The next class is that of

DOWN HILLERS.—Here we begin to slide over to the other side. The picture suddenly gets sombre. We shall dispatch the down hillers sudden. Over these men the paper becomes a bore, it wants one, or the children are zealous to read it—or a neighbor persuades him. When it begins to come, he dismisses all thoughts about it further. If the editor sends a man directly to him at the end of two or three years, he may get some pay for his paper, but will be made to feel that he never pays any debt if he can get rid of it, and a newspaper least of all. Still, he hates lawsuits, and cries aches, and all that. A duo has the same effect on him that a bullet does on a hippopotamus—a gasp, a quiver, and he turns his sole toward his heavenly home. He is always sliding down hill, and never merges into another class, that of

THE NON CON ROLERS.—No matter how this man begins to subscription, he never pays for it—not he. "He doesn't like that sort of paper. It don't give us news. The paper came, but I didn't want it in the first place, and told the postmaster so. He sent back one more than a year ago—besides, he never began to take it to a long time after it came, and he hadn't had only two or three of them, at any rate, and he hadn't read" Wipe him off. How comes the SLACK GRACE.—It is enough to say of him that he never fails to have a newspaper—two or three of them. When he thinks they have come about long enough for the publisher to want pay, he sends for them. Not he! He takes up the matters and leaves for parts unknown. He does not want to pay, and he don't mean to. Get it if you can. Enough for him.

Reader, to which of the above classes are you found?

"MOTHER ENGLAND" whose milk is terribly vitiated
As the sandy growth of her coast off shall
Now coils from "the valiant of creatures,"
But size really takes with a very bad grace,
When fashion feels with the youngsters face,
For saving the family treasure!

☞ The jury in the case of the Rev. Mr. Burroughs, who was tried in the Court of Worcester County, Md., for the murder of his brother-in law, James R. Bishop, returned a verdict of acquittal. It was proved that he acted in self defence.

☞ Tennessee is said to be the only State in the Union that had not a foot of railroad on the first of January last. This is a mistake. Missouri and Iowa, are in the same unbleased category.

☞ A liberal democrat is a public blessing; a money shaver, in its general signification, a public nuisance. We once heard an anecdote of the distinguished Benjamin Watkins Leigh, of Virginia. He met an individual who, on hearing his name, inquired if he had not a relative of the same name in a certain section of country. "Yes," he said, and asked his condition in life. "He has made a fortune," replied the stranger, "shaving paper." "Is it possible," exclaimed Mr. Leigh, "why he left us a gentleman."

☞ Captain S. C. Reid, who was dangerously wounded while in the discharge of his duty in the New York riot, is recovering.

☞ Green peas and strawberries have appeared in the Cincinnati markets, and are plentiful at 50 cts. qt.

☞ The overflow of the Mississippi, is said to have injured Gen. Taylor's cotton plantation to the extent of thirty thousand dollars.

☞ All the posts from Buffalo to Chicago are to be visited by an officer under the direction of the Topographical Bureau, for the purpose of taking measures for an official report of the business facilities and necessities of the Lake Country to Congress next session.

☞ In an old mansion in Sweden, belonging to the family of the Count de Ferson, attached to Louis 16th, there has recently been discovered by the workmen while repairing it, a collection of diamonds worth sixteen hundred thousand dollars, and a sum of nine millions of francs.

☞ The Secretary of the Home Department when solicited for office, says to the applicant, "there are no offices to give, none are worth your attention if vacant, and I would advise you to adopt some other pursuit."

☞ A young gentleman who was in the act of popping the question to a young lady, was interrupted by the father entering the room, inquired what they were about. "Oh," replied the fair one, "Mr. ——— was just explaining the question of annexation to me, and he is for immediate annexation." "Well," said papa, if you can agree on a treaty, I'll ratify it."

☞ The Catholic Fast, of Friday in each week, has been abolished at Cincinnati, as it had been previously at St. Louis, during the prevalence of Cholera—meats especially if smoked, being considered of less danger than fish and vegetables.

☞ Every student who would enter Oxford University, must acknowledge his belief in the "Thirty-nine Articles." A good joke is told of a youth, who, being told at his matriculation that he must subscribe to the Articles, very innocently pulled out his purse, and asked, "How much?"

☞ If the sun is going down, look up to the stars; if the earth is dark, keep your eye on Heaven! With God's presence, and God's promises, a man or child may be cheerful.

☞ The editor of the Haverhill Gazette is of opinion that if "any young man is planning to spread his attentions among ladies in general, without assuming the expenses of a family, he is a nuisance in society, who ought to be despised by the men and shunned by the ladies."

☞ Clarified honey, applied on a linen rag, is said to cure the pain of a burn as if by magic.

☞ Harmless mirth is the best cordial against the consumption of the spirits; wherefore jesting is not unlawful if it trespasses not in quantity, quality or season.

I never saw an oft-removed tree,
Nor yet an oft-removed family,
That throve so well as those that settled be.

☞ "Who is the strongest man?" "The man that can lift his note every day without borrowing."

☞ A chap was asked what kind of a "gal" he preferred for a wife; one, he said, that wasn't prodigal—but frugal—a true gal and suited to his conjugal taste.

☞ Horn, the punster, challenged a sick man's vote at the recent municipal election, on the ground that he was an off voter.

☞ The following is from a Burial ground in Providence, R. I.:

Her soul grew so fast within,
It burst the outward shell of sin,
And so we buried a shell.

☞ James, in his novel of "The Forgery," says: "Two officers in plain clothes walked up to the side [of the coach,] and examined every passenger both inside and out." Perhaps the officers were clairvoyants.

TRAVELLING AGENTS.

MR. ISRAEL K. JAMES, No. 182 South Tenth street, Philadelphia, is our general travelling agent for the business in South Western States, viz: Cities of James K Whipple, William H Wick, O. H. P. Stone, John B. Weld, T. S. Wiseman, John Collins, James Dorsey, Albert K. Wellington, R. S. James, Henry Fox, and J. Rhea Barton.

Also, CHAS. S. HALL, for and in Arkansas.

MR. G. W. JAMES, No. 1 Harrison square, Cincinnati, Ohio, is our general travelling agent for the Western States, namely, James F. Wilson, Chas. Cline, Gardner South, Frederick J. Howe, John W. Armstrong, Jason Taylor, R. M. Stevenson, W. Ramsey and Perrin Leslie.

MR. HENRY M. LEWIS of Montgomery, Alabama, is our general travelling agent for Alabama and Tennessee.

R. MORRIS & Co., are our travelling agents in Mississippi.

WILLIAM A. PIERCE is our only Collector at Hole in Forks.

JOHN B. SOWDLEY will receive subscriptions from new subscribers in the State of Ohio.

MONTIMERE T. WEBB, do do do for New York State.

JUNIUS WHITE, do. do. and collects for us in New York and Canada.

GEO. H. BAKER, do. do. in Illinois.

THE NATURAL AT EVENING POST

May be obtained weekly at the Periodical Depot of JAMES A. GILBERT & Co. Publishers, No. 20 Ann Street, New York City.

HOPKINS & May, Boston, Mass.

H. MILTON BOULDERET, Mobile, Alabama.

M. C. MORGAN, New Orleans, La.

GEO. W. NOBLE, Louisville, Ky.

G. H. P. JOHNS, Dayton, Ohio.

J. W. TAYLOR & Co. Baltimore Md.

O. SAFFORD & PARK, Norwich, Connecticut.

H. HAGAN & CO. Pittsburgh, Pa.

G. W. PRASE & Co., No. 94 6th street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

J. W. RANDOLPH & Co., Richmond, Va.

T. ADAMS, Washington, D. C.

Subscriptions will be received at either of the above mentioned places.

CATTLE MARKETS.

PHILADELPHIA, May 31.—The offering of Beef Cattle for the week reached 1,900 head. On sale, 450 were left at Jeff's yards, 50 at Mill street, and the Beeves came from $7 to 8.50 per 100 lbs. Hogs—These came about 600 in the market, and sold from $7 to 7.25 per 100 lbs. Cows in good demand, and sold for fresh, $45 to $55 for springers, 18 to 25 for dry—Sales at Jeff's yards, and Logan's, at 4 and 5 for calves, $1 to 3.

NEW YORK, May 28th.—Offered 1,500 Beeves, 1,0 Stockers, 500 Cows and Calves, and 400 Sheep and Lambs. Prices &c.—The market for Beef Cattle has been rather inactive. A couple hundred Western steers of heavy may be attributed to the high prices received, we presume, for the Western Beeves. Prices range at from 7½ to 8 cents per lb. These Beeves may be taken as the general average. At our town and Bull's head we sold a few Long Island Beeves at 8 cents. Cows and Calves are positive at a wide range—from $18 to $50 for common to good, and $55 to $70 to $75, 80 left over. Sheep and Lambs from $2.50, $3 to $5. Lambs $2.50, $3, $3.50. 100 Sheep left over.

NEW YORK MARKETS, MAY 26.

The force go news is unfavorable for Flour, and the quotations are 25 lower. Sales to-day, 5,000 bbls for the trade and the East, and seven 5,000 bbls at $4.12½@4.31 for the whole range of common to good extra Ohio, and fancy brands, and $4.31 for prime Genesee. Some idea of South Bump Ohio sold at $4.37½. In Southern flour there is no change and the sales do not exceed 500 bbls at $4.75@4.87½. Rye Flour is without material change, and 300 barrels at $3.19 to $3.25 for Pennsylvania, and $3.12½ for Jersey, and $3.12½ for Brandywine.

Grain are unchanged, and in good demand. Sales 200 bbls at yesterday's quotations.

The Cotton market has been not special since the steamer, and no business has been transacted.

Sugar—Sales 50,000 lbs Cuba Muscovado at 5½ @5½ cent.

Whisky.—In no a sale of 7,000 lbs at 21c.

Grain—The market is heavy for Wheat, and the operations are in light; sales 5,000 bushels Ohio at $1.08@1.09 per bushel, and 1,000 bushels Southern in bag sales, and the rates alone the seaports are the same. Transactions in Corn are limited, and prices changed, the demand is not Southern and shipping for round yellow. Rye is held at 90c without sales of consequence. Barley is out of market. Oats are rather easier, and quoted at 37@38c for Northern. A sale of 500 bushels Southern at 40c, and 500 bbls at 47c.

WHISKEY—The same embargo 500 bbls at 21c for Ohio, and 19@19½ for Prime. 50 casks Drudge sold at 20c.

PROVISIONS—The market is quiet, and quotations nominally as before.

PROVISIONS—The demand for Pork has been large to-day, and the sales amount up 1,000 bbls at 15 for Mess, $16.12½ for Prime Mess, and $8.50 for Prime, some more prime sold at private terms.

BALTIMORE TOBACCO MARKET.

The Baltimore Patriot says:—The Tobacco market is without any change worth mentioning. There are a trifle more of the good and fine sorts offering, and a little more inquiry for the good and fine sorts, but no sale of any consequence has transpired. The sales for the week have been very light, at and within the quotations of last week. We can now quote Ohio at from 4 to 6 cents, and Maryland and Virginia at from 6 to 12 cents, according to quality. We quote as follows, viz.—Maryland Sale, for common, from $2 to $3; good, $3.50 to $4; fine and better qualities, common Ohio $3 to $4; good $4.50 to $5; fine and superior do. $5.50 to $6; fancy lots range from $6.50 to $8. Louisiana sales include, including 1,97: Maryland, 6; Ohio, and 75 Kentucky.

ADAMS AND CLAY.

The paragraph from the Jersey City Telegraph, about a lady in that city using an onion instead of a pin cushion to stick her needles in, and finding the next morning that they all had "taken in their sum," called to mind an anecdote of the late John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay. We do not recollect having ever seen it in print, but even if it has been, it will, we think, bear repetition:—

When these distinguished statesmen were at Ghent, negotiating our treaty with Great Britain, they occupied a room together. Mr. Clay, who had always been a warm admirer of female beauty, had often remarked the comely looks of their chamber-maid, and had once or twice joked with Mr. Adams about it. One morning he arose some time after Mr. Adams, and on his way to the breakfast table he met the pretty maid referred to. Saluting her in his blandest style, and in his usual easy and graceful manner, while a smile played upon his countenance, he solicited the pleasure of a kiss. Astonished at the request, the fair Miss Adams' eyes always presented a watery appearance, which at times made him look as if in tears. The chambermaid not knowing the cause, we presume, replied to Mr. Clay, with the greatest simplicity imaginable, "why, Mr. Clay, I do not like to disobleige you, but perhaps you will excuse me when I assure you that I have just refused Mr. Adams the same liberty, with tears in his eyes." We read not say that Mr. Clay had too much gallantry to press his suit, but subsequently met Mr. Adams, who joined him in a hearty laugh.—Newark Eagle.

Original Essays.

HARMONIES OF NATURE.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

NO. IX.

In my last number were considered the great wisdom and goodness of God, in bestowing on each animal what is peculiarly requisite for its nature and situation. This theme has been observed by philosophers, ancient and modern, and some of the ancient poets have furnished us with charming pictures, by copying these scenes of nature. The tender Anacreon gives us a striking example. I cannot resist the pleasure of giving to my readers a free, though, I fear, a free translation of his ode on this subject:

Nature is wise and bountiful,
How wisely with goodness are replete!
For arms she gave horns to the bull,
And to the courser strength of feet,
To the bold lion and the bear,
Sharp teeth and claws, the fierce to fight,
Great speed bestowed upon the hare,
The timorous to shun by flight.
The fish received flying air,
To cave at pleasure in the sea,
The sprightly bird a wing to soar,
And with a sting she armed the bee.
Reason she gave to thinking man,
To be his guide in his career.
No precious gift did she remain
To be bestowed upon the lyre.
Kind Nature made, for love to show,
The choicest work she ever designed,
On lovely woman did bestow
Beauty to reign over mankind.
Great Love, thy empire and command,
May in their kingdoms rule awhile;
But we behold, in every land,
All mortals yield to woman's smile.

But, leaving the Muses to rest, let us descend from Parnassus, and contemplate the laws of motion, which relate to those admirable pieces of workmanship of our wise and beneficent Creator—I mean the insects, which we heedlessly pass by, without notice.

Some of these insects have no defence, except the diversity of their motion. When the notopeds or elater is laid upon its back, it uses a spring hidden in its breast, and, like a skilful jumper, it falls upon its feet; the butterfly escapes from the birds by its zig-zag flight; the spider runs from its enemies by letting itself down its thread, like a sailor along a cable; the gyrene describes with rapidity circles on the crystal waters, and the tipula lightly extends their dances there without wetting their wings.

If we cast a passing glance upon the fishes, we must perceive that the fluid which surrounds them serves as a means of conveyance; aided by their fins, they travel through their domains with ease and comfort. Nature has provided them with a bladder, which, when they wish, have power to empty and again to fill at pleasure; and thus they diminish or increase the weight and volume of their bodies as they rise or fall in the water.

It is not generally known that some fishes, like birds, are provided with an oily gland; with this their scales are anointed with a substance which protects them from the relaxing effects of the water. But what is most surprising is, that this gland is placed on the head, in such a manner that the fish can easily anoint themselves with the oil to take over their bodies, and covers them completely. Without this admirable position, this gland would have been useless, as fishes have neither hands nor feet to anoint themselves with this oil.

When we study the laws of motion, and perceive how admirable are the material ends which roll over our heads, and on the almost imperceptible insect which puts in play its muscles, bones and tendons, to walk, swim or fly, we cannot but admire the wisdom of Providence. The same law preserves the stars, embellishes Nature and gives life to plants and animals. It is in the contemplation of these interesting scenes, that the Almighty seems to invite us to seek proofs of His wisdom, goodness and power.

BUBULCUS.

Clippings.

☞ There is a vast deal of sound philosophy in the vulgar dictich—

"Different men have different opinions
Some likes leeks and some likes onions"

☞ The Washington Court of Appeals have confirmed the verdict of the Criminal Court, in the case of Tom Hall, convicted of stealing the Government Jewels, on the 4th of November last. He will be sentenced to three years imprisonment in the Penitentiary.

☞ A gentleman having presented his Church with the Ten Commandments, it was witily said "he had given them away because he did not want to keep them."

☞ A CHANCE FOR A TANNER.—A prize of three hundred guineas has been offered in England for the best essay on royalty, aristocracy and democracy.

☞ A gentleman addressing a lady whom he was partial to, and who had several articles of his in her possession, said—"Madam, I shall present my bill to you shortly, for payment." "You will have to take it out in sulking," replied the lady.

☞ "What is a rebus?" innocently asked a lovely miss of a black eyed lad. Imprinting a kiss on her breathing lips, he replied: "If you can see it right from the compliment, you take a sweet kiss." She was satisfied with the information.

☞ The bank clerks in Lombard Street, London, carry their checks and bills about with them in cases chained to their arms! The thief cannot steal the case without carrying off the clerk.

☞ "I think," said an old toper, commenting upon the habits of a young man, who was fast making a beast of himself, "when a man reaches a certain point in drinkin', he ought to stop."

☞ A new patent stove for the convenience of travellers, has just been invented. It is placed under the feet, and a mustard-plaster upon the head draws the heat through the whole system.

☞ Jobbs are like the measles of the most obedient boys in the world. All he has to do is to tell him to do as he pleases, and he does it without murmuring.

☞ ENCOURAGING TO DRY GOODS DEALERS.—The New York Dry Book states that some tender-foot who commence the dry goods jobbing business in that city fail.

☞ A man has been fined five thousand dollars in Tallapoosa county, Alabama, for slandering the chastity of a lady.

☞ A stranger having entered the apartment where the Emperor Napoleon was shaving himself, when in a little town in Italy, he said—"I want to see your great Emperor—what are you to him?" The Emperor replied—"I shave him."

☞ "Come, get up—you've been in bed long enough," as the gardener said, when he was pulling up radishes to send to market.

☞ Why is Miss Terry the most puzzling lady in London? Because she is a mystery (Miss Terry.)

☞ One reason why the world is not reformed, is because every man would have others take a start, never thinking of himself.

☞ National vanity is but personal vanity magnified many million times.

☞ Laugh at no man for his pug-nose—you never can tell what may come up.

☞ The wicked and sensual part of the world are only concerned to find scope and room enough to wallow in; if they can but have it, wherever they have it troubles not their thoughts; saying grace in no part of their meal; they feed and grovel like swine under an oak, filling themselves with the mast, but never so much as looking up either to the boughs that bore, or the lands that shook it down.—*Dr

Selected Poetry.

MAN AND WOMAN.

BY MRS. EDMASB.

Warrior! whose image on thy tomb,
With shield and crested head,
Sleeps proudly in the purple gloom
By the stain'd window shed!
The records of thy name and race
Have faded from the stone,
Yet through o'aloud of years I trace
What then had been and done

A banner floats its dashing spear
Flung out o'er many a fight;
A war-cry ringing far and clear,
And strong to turn the flight;
An arm that heavily bore the lance,
Oh, for the holy shrine,
A haughty heart and kingly glance—
Chief! were not these things thine?

A lofty place where leaders sate
Around the council board;
In festive halls a chair of state,
When the blood red wine was pour'd;
A name that drew a prouder tone
From herald, harp, and bard;
Surely these things were all thine own,
So hadst thou thy reward!

Woman! whose sculptured form at rest
By the arm'd knight is laid,
With meek hands folded o'er thy breast
In matron robes arrayed,
What was thy tale?—oh, gentle mate
Of him the bold and free,
Bound unto his victorious fate,
What hard bath sung of thee?

He wore a bright and burning star!
Thine was the void, the gloom,
The straining eye that follow'd far
His oft-receding plume;
The heart-sick listening while his steed
Spoke echoes on the breeze;
The pang—but when did dame take heed
Of gricfs obscure as these?

Thy silent and secluded hours,
Through many a lonely day,
While beading o'er thy broider'd flowers,
With spirit far away;
Thy weeping midnight prayers for him
Who fought on Syrian plains,
Thy watchings till the work grew dim,—
These fill no minstrel strains.

A still and life wea thine!—long years,
With tasks unguerdoned fraught,
Deep, quiet love, submissive tears,
Yight of scarcely thought;
Prayers at the cross in fervor poured,
Aims to the pilgrims given;
Oh, happy, happier thou thy lord,
In that love path to Heaven!

Selected Sketch.

FROM THE LADY'S BOOK

ANECDOTES OF WASHINGTON.

BY REV HENRY F HARRINGTON.

"'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view,"
not in scenery alone, but everything with which we have to do. And very prominent among the softening effects of distance, is the vague and often deceptive charm it throws around great men—great in mighty deeds of worth or wickedness. In the lapse of years, the closer outlines of character and action are lost to sight. The harder touches, deprived of their relief, are thus thrown into clearer prominence, and the individual often acquires thereby an access of glorious reputation which he did not merit, or bear a memory more deeply accursed than the pollution of his life would have warranted.

This effect is a source of disappointment as well as of injustice. Whenever the individual has stamped his impress deep on the age he lived in, there is a longing for authentic records of the simple and ordinary occurrences of his private life, that they may be, as they justly should be, the interpreters of his public deeds—the deeds that have made him what he is in the chronicles.

Sometimes, when, for instance, the subject is of especial note, or bears a memory peculiarly endeared, the absence of knowledge about his private life and less pretending conduct, is a serious misfortune. Let me apply these remarks more particularly. Let me refer to Washington. We have few anecdotes of his private life. We know little of him in those humbler hours when he threw off the cares of State or Generalship, and talked, and acted, and laughed, and sported as other men. We have caught impressions of him from his grave countenance in the pictures, and from the ponderous tomes that tell of plans and battles, and sieges and marches, until there are many, I do not doubt, into whose minds it never entered that he could smile and have his hours of sportive gaiety.

The want of chronicles of the life of Washington, of the description that I have spoken of, is especially lamentable, because there is nothing to be found from them. The private life of that glorious man was as free from stain as his public life was surpassingly admirable. They who cherish the memory of greatness that had no alliance with goodness, may well be required that nothing remains of it but the record of the actions that have won for it its name. They may well rejoice at the silence of history, fearful that its further story, had it one to tell, would mar the fascinating and deceptive illusion. But the lovers of Washington could gain from every count of his life, whether little or great, only fresh evidence of his exalted purity, his ennobling sense of right, his disinterested self-sacrifice. And how eagerly every little anecdote of his hours of boyhood or manly relaxation that has been given to the world, has been read upon and treasured up. How many children have been stimulated to imitable truth, in the face of suffering, by the story that is told of him in his youth—very one knows it—when he injured with his hatchet one of his father's favorite trees; yet told the truth about it in the face of expected punishment. What a bearing this little anecdote alone has exerted over many minds, giving a coloring to the impressions of his whole after and remarkable life!

Those who knew him well, and who possess treasures of these little manifestations of the real man, are fast passing away. Scarce a lonely one is here and there remaining—a relic of the bygone time—Let us rejoice of those who know of such, and have gathered from their relations what would create delight and interest through a whole nation, not to suffer them to be lost forever.

There lately died, in the city of Boston, a very respectable negro, named Prince Hall. He lived to an advanced age, and was the possessor of considerable property. Throughout the Revolutionary War he was the body servant of the late Col. Pickering, of Massachusetts. He was free and communicative, and delighted to sit down with an interested listener and pour out these stores of absorbing and exciting anecdotes with which his memory was stored.

It is well known that there was no officer in the whole American army whose friendship was dearer to Washington, and whose counsel was more esteemed by him, than that of the honest and patriotic Col. Pickering. He was on intimate terms with him, and addressed himself to him with as little reserve as, perhaps, to any confident in the army—Whenever he was stationed within such a distance as to admit of it, he passed many hours with the Colonel, consulting him upon anticipated measures, and delighting in his reciprocated friendship.

Washington was, therefore, often brought into contact with the servant of Col. Pickering, the departed Prince. An opportunity was afforded to the negro to note him, under circumstances very different from those in which he is usually brought before the public, and which possess, therefore, a striking charm. I remember two of these anecdotes from the mouth of Prince. One of them is very slight indeed, yet so peculiar as to be replete with interest. The other conveys a high and holy moral, and deserves to be recorded among the public and remarkable acts of our country's saviour, as a brilliant illustration that disinterestedness and true humility were guiding principles of his character.—The authenticity of both may be fully relied upon.

Washington once came to Col. Pickering's quarters, and found him absent.

"It is no matter," said he to Prince. "I am greatly in need of exercise. You must help me to get some before your master returns."

Under Washington's directions, the negro busied himself in some simple preparations. A stake was driven into the ground about breast high, a rope was tied to it, and then Prince was directed to stand at some distance and hold it horizontally extended. The boys, the country over, are familiar with this plan of getting sport. With true boyish zest, Washington ran forwards and backwards for some time, jumping over the rope as he came and went, until he expressed himself satisfied with the "exercise."

Repeatedly, afterwards, when a favorable opportunity offered, he would say—"Come, Prince, I am in need of exercise," whereat the negro would drive down the stake, and Washington would jump over the rope until he had exercised himself to his content.

On the second occasion, the great General was engaged in earnest consultation with Col. Pickering in his tent until wine the night had fairly set in.—Hand quarters were at a considerable distance, and Washington signified his preference to staying with the Colonel over night, provided he had a spare blanket and straw.

"Oh, you," said Prince, who was appointed to "provide straw and blankets—plenty."

Upon this assurance, Washington continued his conference with the Colonel until it was time to retire to rest. Two humble beds were spread, side by side, in the tent, and the officers laid themselves down, while Prince seemed to be busy with duties that required his attention before he himself could sleep. He watched, or appeared to watch, until the breathing of his prostrate gentleman satisfied him that they were sleeping; and then, seating himself on a box or stool, he leaned his head on his hands to obtain such repose as so inconvenient a position would allow. In the middle of the night Washington awoke. He looked about, and descried the negro as he sat. He gazed at him awhile and then spoke

"Prince!" said he, calling; "Prince!"

Prince started up and rubbed his eyes. "What, General!" said he.

Washington rose up in his bed. "Prince," said he, "what did you mean by raying that you had straw and blankets enough? Here you have given up your blanket and straw to me, that I may sleep comfortably, while you are obliged to sit through the night."

"It's nothing, General," said Prince. "It's nothing. I'm used enough. Don't trouble yourself about me, General, but go to sleep again. No matter about me. I sleep very good."

"But it is matter—it is matter," said Washington, earnestly. "I cannot do it, Prince. If either is to sit up, I will. But I think there is no need of either sitting up. The blanket is wide enough for two. Come and lie down here with me."

"Oh, no, General!" said Prince, starting, and protesting against the proposition. "No; let me sit here. I'll do very well on the stool."

"I say, come and lie down here!" said Washington, authoritatively. "There is room for both, and I insist upon it!"

He threw open the blanket as he spoke, and moved to one side of the straw. Prince professes to have been exceedingly shocked at the idea of lying under the same covering with the Commander-in-Chief, but his tone was so resolute and determined that he could not hesitate. He prepared himself, therefore, and laid himself down by Washington; and on the same straw, and under the same blanket, the General and the negro servant slept until morning.

I say that this last incident conveys a high and holy moral. It affords indubitable evidence, and that of the clearest nature, that the reverential admiration of the American people for their Washington is not misplaced. He acted from that pure and deep-seated principle, that true nobility of character and self-respect, which enabled him to bear himself with lofty dignity in the presence of the president, and, at the same time, impelled him to respect the rights and sympathize with the sufferings of the humblest.

The first anecdote, trifling as it is, in of moment, because so very little of a sportive nature has been connected with the records of Washington. Few letters of this description have been found among his papers; and few anecdotes of him, of the kind, have been given to the public.

A very interesting letter, of humorous character, was lately presented to the New York Historical Society, written by Washington in 1779. Head quarters were then at West Point, New York, at which place the letter was dated. It not only adds to the testimony to the simplicity of Washington's character, but shows, also, the necessities and embarrassments of the time. It is superscribed, "Dr. Cochrane, New Windsor."

"WEST POINT, Jan 16th, 79.

"Dear Doct:—I have asked Mrs Cochrane and Mr. Livingston to dine with me to-morrow, but ought I not to apprise them of their fare? As I hate deception, even where the imagination only is concerned, I will.

"It is needless to promise that my table is large enough to hold the ladies—of that they had ocular proof yesterday. To say how it is usually covered is rather more essential, and this shall be the purport of my letter.

"Since our arrival at this happy spot, we have had a ham (sometimes a shoulder) of bacon to grace the head of the table, a piece of roast beef adorns the foot, and a small dish of greens or beans (almost imperceptible) decorates the centre. When the cook has a mind to cut a figure (and this, I presume, he will attempt to morrow) we have two hasheas pur or dishes of crabs in addition, one on each side of the centre dish, dividing the space, and reducing the distance between dish and dish about six feet, which, without them, would be nearly twelve feet apart.

"Of late, we had the surpassing luck to discover that apples will make pies, and it's a question if, amidst the violence of his efforts, we do not get one of apples, instead of having both of beef.

"If the ladies can put up with such entertainment, and will submit to partake of it on plates, once tin, but now iron, (not become so by the labor of scouring,) I shall be happy to see them.

Original Essay.

FACTS IN THE PHILOSOPHY OF VEGETATION.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST,
BY J. R. HOWARD.

There are a few facts connected with the philosophy of vegetation, which are much more important than, at first thought, might be supposed; and which, were they properly understood, appreciated and applied, might lead to important results in agriculture and horticulture, and to the exploosion of several popular errors and fallacies. They are those connected with the absorption, by plants and trees, of nutriment from the atmosphere. Though versed in truisms on botany, and known to many who have not made that branch of science a study, as facts in the vegetable kingdom, they have not yet, perhaps received that particular attention which they deserve, when their importance, in a most interesting and practical point of view, is considered. From careful experiments that have been made, the amount of nutriment thus absorbed by plants from the atmosphere, has been found so great as to almost surpass belief. And yet, that they should thus imbibe any at all, may at first glance be a matter of surprise to many when they contrast the insubstantial and apparently void state of the atmosphere with the opposite one of the earth, from which they have been accustomed to view vegetation as deriving all its nutriment. To such, while it will excite in their minds sensations of agreeable surprise and wonder, it will open a new and extensive field for reflection, observation and experiment.

There are facts well known to the popular mind, which can be accounted for only on this principle. For instance, if a tree or a plant be kept constantly stripped of its leaves, it will cease to grow, and soon die. The reason is that it is by or through them, that it derives from the atmosphere an important part of its nutriment, an indispensable part; and being deprived of them, and thus having this important element cut off, it soon ceases to thrive and live. Again, if the tops or vines of the edible roots, as the potato, be kept cut off constantly, the root will not grow any, and never mature; being thus deprived of the nutriment, necessary to be received from the atmosphere, through action of the leaves and stems of the plant. This is particularly the case with the Irish potato and the artichoke. And this principle of atmospheric nourishment explains how this potato can be raised in what are usually termed "lazy beds." These, it is well known, consist of nothing but sod straw, in which the potato is planted, without any soil whatever entering into the composition. This straw is laid, after being made sufficiently thick, on a piece of hard earth, that has been well trampled or pressed, or on boards or plank laid flat on the ground, with a low pen placed around to support the edges of the straw. The potato here springs up and produces, as though in a bed of soil! The straw affords a kind of bed or nursery, for it to form in; and from its rapid decomposition also a sort of hot-bed, which forces it in its growth; and hence the use of these "lazy-beds" in producing early potatoes. Now from the circumstance of the potato not being thrust and matured when kept constantly deprived of the top or vine, and of the absence of soil in these "lazy-beds," it is evident that it must, at least in this case, derive its nutriment principally, or almost entirely, from the atmosphere. That, in this case, the decomposing straw may and does afford some nutriment, we will not attempt to deny; but it must be of a character essentially different from that received from the soil, as the straw must be entirely decomposed before it can enter into the composition of soil. It is also on this principle (of the imbibing of nutriment from the atmosphere,) that we see wheat, oats or rye that has been left in shock or chaff exposed to the rain, spring up and flourish for a while. And it is this, too, that will explain the apparent phenomenon of the growth of wheat, when planted in soft onion pulp in a tumbler or small jar, and kept moistened. It is evident that the wheat must, in this case, derive its nutriment from the atmosphere. And the wheat thus planted will be found to flourish best where it can obtain the most carbon. Hence it will generally grow best over the mantel-piece in a room that is occupied. But grain thus situated, can never mature, either in stalk or seed, as sun and other proper aids are necessary, which can be derived only from the soil.

For the reasons which we have shown, straw and chaff will be found to be the best manure for the "Irish" and "sweet" potato,—the straw for the "Irish," and the chaff for the "sweet." The chaff may also be equally good for the Irish, but the reason it is better than straw for the "sweet," is, that it can be better mixed with the soil in which it is planted. The straw might, perhaps, do just as well were it cut fine and thoroughly mixed. This is not necessary in the case of the Irish potato, as the potato being formed above the "planting" or seed in the straw as a "nursery" for it, it is only necessary, after breaking up the ground, to open a deep trench, drop the potato into it at the proper distances, and then fill it with the straw, and cover it with soil, raising the earth over it into a little ridge, so as to prevent it from being "baked" too hard by the rains and sun. Irish potatoes thus planted in autumn, (with a sufficient ridge raised over them) will come much earlier than those planted in spring, in the ordinary way.

It is upon this principle (of the imbibement of nourishment from the atmosphere,) that the "potato disease" may be explained, which has been the cause of such terrible destruction in this most useful crop, particularly in Europe. It is an atmospheric disease, just as the Cholera is in respect to the human system; and it is because this potato is so dependent upon the atmosphere for nutriment, that it suffers so from its attacks. Like the Cholera, it has progressed westward in its ravages. And it is only on this principle that the most effectual remedies for this disease can be explained. These are of two kinds: those applied to the tops and those to the root. The disease, we believe, does not attack the potato until it matures, or is about to arrive at maturity; and hence the cutting off of the vines or tops then, as has been said to have been practiced with success, by thus cutting off the communication of the potato with the vitiated atmosphere, was, in effect, cutting off the disease. While in vigorous growth, it is exempt from the disease, but as soon as this begins to cease, it then becomes liable to it, so the resistance thus offered against it by the force of this, by the vine, ceases, just as the same circumstances exempt children from diseases which attack the adult. The remedies applied to the root or seed, must consist of such as will, in their action on the plant or top, fortify it against the disease. CONCLUDED IN NEXT.

Wit and Humor.

COMPLIMENTARY.—The Cincinnati Commercial tells a good story, which we have heard it said is a very crack-brained man, who never indulges in the use of ardent spirits, is suspected of taking a drop now and then. An occurrence which took place yesterday morning verifies this fact.

"Our old friend, William Lock, was passing along Fourth Street early after breakfast, when his progress was politely arrested by a well-dressed, well-fed gentleman, from the country, with,

"'Sir, can you inform me where I can procure a few gallons of fine old brandy? I wish to take it out to my place for private use.'

"'Well, sir,' said Mr L., 'I am informed that Mr S——, of the Bank Exchange, is an fast in these matters and will supply you.'

"'So, sir!' showing the stranger where Mr S——, is to be found, continued,

"'You have the advantage of me—I don't know you.'

"'Nor do I know you,' replied the stranger, 'but you look like a man who knows where the best brandy is to be found.'

"Mr L. turned to the stranger, and passed down the street, muttering that he did not know which excelled, the man's politeness or his impudence."

EXCUSE FOR SMOKING.—In the reign of James I., of tobacco-hating notoriety, the boys of a school acquired the habit of smoking, and indulged it slyly and day, using the most ingenious expedients to conceal the vice from their masters, till one luckless evening when the imps were huddled together round the fire of their dormitory, involving each other in vapors of their own creating, lo! in burst the master and stood in awful dignity before them.

"How now," quoth the dominie to the first lad, "how dare you smoke tobacco?"

"Sir," said the boy, "I am subject to headaches, and a pipe takes off the pain."

"And you! and you! and you!" inquired the pedagogue, questioning every boy in his turn.

One had a "raging tooth," another cholic; the third a cough; in short, they all had something.

"Sir, sir, sobbed," bellowed the doctor to the last boy, "what disorder do you smoke for?"

Alas! all the excuses were exhausted, but the interrogated urchin, putting down his pipe, after a faint-well whiff, and looking up in his master's face, said, in a whining, hypocritical tone, "Sir, I smoke for cores!"

MORBID MISTAKE.—When General Moreau, who afterwards became the rival of Napoleon, and was killed fighting against his former comrades in battle, was in this city, he was much courted and sought after as a lion of the first quality. On one occasion he was invited to Cambridge to attend the Commencement Exercises. In the course of the day a musical society of under graduates sang a then very popular air, the chorus of which was "Moreau, to-morrow, to-morrow." Moreau, who was imperfectly acquainted with our language, fancied that they were complimenting him, and at every recurrence of the burthem, which he interpreted "To Moreau, to Moreau, to Moreau," he rose and bowed gracefully to the singers. The fellows, getting his label, (begun to be heart. We can easily imagine the amusement of the spectators who were in the secret, and the muffled "hallelujahs" of the mortified Frenchman, when he discovered his mistake.—Boston (Mass) Bee.

THE DIFFERENCE.—A gentleman from Boston chanced to find himself among a little party of young ladies away Down East, last summer, and while on the enjoyment of some innocent social play, he carelessly placed his arm about the waist of as pretty a damsel as Maine can boast of, when she started and exclaimed,—"He dares sir! Don't insult me!" The gentleman instantly apologized for the seeming rudeness, and assured the half offended fair one that he did not intend to insult her.

"Not!" she replied, archly. "Well, if you didn't—you may do so again," she added, in the no small amusement of the company!

SPECULATIVE UNCONCERN.—The tranquillity and phlegm of the Scotch in the most extraordinary circumstances, "brings to mind," says Colman, in his "Random Records," the incredible tale of Sir Sandy-man's tumble from one of the loftiest houses in the old town of Edinburgh. He slipped, says the legend, off the roof of a habitation sixteen stories high, and when midway in his descent through the air, he arrived at a ledger jutting out at a window of the eighth floor, to which (as he was an acquaintance) he observed as he passed, "Eh, Sandy, man, sir a fa as I shall hae!"

A BOARDING SCHOOL MISS.—I have heard of a young lady "Down East," who sang "alto" in one of the churches. She had been at a boarding school for half a quarter somewhere and came home perfectly amazed that her schoolmistake pays did not draw at "clear sclock." There was favorite anthem commencing, "Turn, oh, Lord, oh, turn away!" Ax, much performed by the choir. She always chanted it, "Tenburn, tenburn, oh, Lord! oh, tenburn away," much to the edification of the congregation, most of whom were extremely engaged in the dairy business.

ANGLICE.—A fashionable Doctor lately informed his friends in a large company, that he had been passing eight days in the country.

"Yes," said one of the party, "it has been announced in one of the journals."

"Ah!" said the Doctor, stretching his neck very importantly, "pray in what terms?"

"In what terms! Why, as well as I can remember, in the following: 'Three were lost week seventy-seven interments less than the week before.'"

IRISH ARGUMENT FOR PRIME LAST.—Felix M'Carthy, of the Kerry Militia, was generally late on parade.

"Ah, Felix," said the Sergeant, "you are always last."

"By any, Sergeant Sullivan," was his reply, "sure someone must be last."

A SCRUTINIZER.—A Prince laughing at one of his courtiers, whom he had employed in several embassies, told him he looked like an owl.

"I know not," answered the courtier, "what I look like; but this I know, that I have had the honor several times to represent your majesty's person."

THE REMEDY.—"Oh, doctor," said an elderly lady recently, to Dr. H——, the celebrated beauty-setter, in describing the effects of a diamond spider, "I can neither lay nor set."

"I should recommend, then," replied he, "the propriety of coming!"

FILIAL AFFECTION.—An Irishman, swearing the peace against his three sons, thus concluded:—"The only one of my children who shows me any real filial affection, is my youngest son, Larry, for he never strikes me when I'm down."

For the Ladies.

FROM THE SATURDAY VISITER.

LETTERS TO COUNTRY GIRLS.

BY MRS. SWISSHELM.

Well positively, girls, you are too much trouble. I do believe girls were created on purpose to annoy unacceptable young gentlemen; and nervous old ladies! Here, Mag has gone off a visiting, and left me to keep house a whole week, with nobody but Mary for help; she would rather make a "play house" than wash dishes. Well, I have been most industrious, and yesterday was office day! When I went there, what was waiting for me amongst the rest of my troubles but the longest, neatest letter "from a Country girl!" It is too bad; and if the world continues getting worse at this rate, the people must all move out of it. Just to think the way girls will talk to old folks! It was not so in my young days! This Miss Sance has hints that she can quilt as fast as I can, and hinters me to go all the way to Mahoning to try. I shall not do any such thing, Annise, for if you have taken such good care of your hands, maybe your fingers are pretty supple. But mark you, your old cotton gloves are not nearly so good as woollen ones you had knit yourself. So, you have a bee and a sun-bonnet, have you; and do not bake your face before a wood fire, but use a stove? All very good so far! You think the complexion of the girls in your region very fine and fresh, do you! And you are neither bilious nor nervous; and "drink your coffee twice a day and tea once!" But you last of the ladies there answer my description as to being wrinkled and sallow! Well, pretty Annise, how long will it be before you are as old and ugly as any of them? Your health and complexion may endure your diet for years; but sooner or later they must yield! At thirty, women should be in their prime; but how many do you know, at that age, who look as well as they did at eighteen? They drank their coffee and ate their hot cake as you do; and perhaps no one could have persuaded them their diet was injurious. How many coffee drinkers do you know who never have a headache? Time out of every three have it and take a cup of coffee to relieve it; on the homeopathic principle, that what creates a disease will cure it. You may drink your coffee and eat your rich victuals, and still your complexion is fresh and your health fine for some years; but after a while other folks will think of you as you do of those old ladies now; who, you think, would suit very well in a corn field to scare crows. Most likely any of them looked as well at your age as you do, and felt as well, too. Your time is coming. Did you never observe the brilliant complexions, beautiful teeth and full forms of Irish women when they first come to this country? But they are not long have unless they look like the rest of us, and people blame it on the climate; but it is not half so much that as the diet. It is the gormandizing of the people in this country which makes them the sallow-faced creatures they are! Whenever I hear of fevers and prevalent sickness in some fine country where there is abundance of pure air and water, with no swamps to create disease, I ask the price of provisions. If turkies can be bought for twenty five cents, chickens for a fip, eggs for three cents per dozen, &c; I am at no loss to know where the sickness comes from! There is Morgan county in Ohio, I had a friend who lived there and there was no end to the accounts of black tongue, erysipelas, lung fevers, bilious fevers and sickness without ceasing. It is a hilly country well drained, land not very rich, and pure limestone water; but it was too far from market for the surplus provisions to be carried off, and so the people ate them, and lived under the doctors hands continually. But here in Butler county where "the birds carry knapsacks," I have seen set down for supper for half a dozen persons, a large turkey, two pairs of chickens, a big roast of veal, a great dish of ham, and chipped beef, piles of bread and rusk as white as a snow drift—hot biscuits and flannel cakes—two great pound cakes and a pair of sponge cakes—two dishes of sugar crackers and as many doughnuts—mashed turnips and potatoes—three kinds of preserved kinds with preserves and jellies past my calculation—oh yes! and a dish of moulded rice to be eaten with cream and sugar; and the whole mixture washed down with hot coffee and tea. It was enough amount of pollyeness not to eat a piece of everything on the table, and just to see a lady clearing a plate of turkey, and then "Mrs. ——, some chicken!" "A small piece, if you please, sir!"

The small piece would pass over and disappear. Then for another, or "a slice of veal!" You have not tasted the veal!" And some one who has visited in the country, and knows that it "is a veal" of course a small piece of veal must be eaten; and as it would not do to slight the ham, a small piece of that follows; then comes the cake, rice, and preserves—the pound cake is so nice that some sponge cake must be swallowed; and surely one could not refuse a little pickle! And a sugar cake! they are so small, you can always eat a sugar cake! The peaches are so good that one is forced to try the pears; and then the quinces! they have been put up on a new plan, and you must positively give your opinion! The strawberries were a present from a friend, and you must eat some strawberries! Susan made that jelly, the first she ever made and as Susan is very proud of her jelly, it would never do to overlook, or pass it by;—and by the time one gets done, oh! dear, what a supper is made! This is not a solitary instance! I seldom saw a tea-drinking in Butler County, with less catables than here men noted, and if any one disputes my testimony, let her summons Judge Bredin! More times than two have I seen him sad to do the honors on such an occasion.

Now, let any one, even unacquainted with the laws of physiology imagine a stomach with such a load of food, and if they wonder at the generation of dyspepsia? It is just exactly you, country girls, who make us so! You cook and eat, and eat and cook—pamper the appetites of those around you, until they disdain plain, wholesome food. When a young man leaves his country home, and goes to a city, he can scarce live, except at an expensive hotel. The rich products of the dairy, and poultry yard, and orchards, are money matters in cities, and it is a blessing they are for if the folks in cities could live as our rich farmers do, they would not live long! It is nothing but the love, pure air, and general exercise enjoyed by country people, which enables their constitutions to resist so long the effect of their diet. The average health and length of life is not greater among them than city people, because their diet counterbalances their other advantages. I do wish some one who loves statistics and figures would estimate the saving to a settlement of a year's work, ready for provisions! If I ever bet, I should risk a good deal on the position that a country will be healthy in proportion as people do not eat their surplus marketing. One-half of all the sickness in our new counties, arises from the people having to be their own consumers. The Irish famine never killed half as many people as the American surplus has done. And I would just ask "Sir" and "Annise," if they would not be as well employed plaiting flounces, trees and vines, to beautify their homes, and cultivate the fine and nobler feelings of our nature,—as they are cooking victuals to make people sick, and then nursing them to make them well again? You bake, and boil, and fry, and stew, worry and toil, just as if people's principal business in this world was to learn how much they could eat—and eat it. You kill about one-half the travelling preachers with chickens and other fixings; and my notion is—you might be better employed.

Selected Articles.

COLLEGE ANNA OINTMENT.—Last week I called to see a sick person, a few miles from my home, and as I arrived about dinner time, I was invited to unite with the family at their meal. The lady of the house had a cousin visiting her, a pretty, somewhat phlegmatic girl of sixteen, who had never been accustomed to any other fare than pork, potatoes and "flower victuals." As we sat at the table, I observed that this Miss T——— was on the look out to see what the rest of us were doing—her napkin she left untouched until she saw the others in use, when she copied as all as if she always used one. I was somewhat amused with her carefare notwithstanding her intelligence. She managed very well, though, until, as a sort of dessert, a dish of boiled rice was brought in, and also a dish of sauce, compound, I believe, of sugar and butter, rubbed up together, and a little nutmeg in it. You have probably seen the sauce, then prepared and recollect its appearance. Well, the rice was served out, and upon the side of each plate was placed a fair proportion of the sauce. This was all fresh to Miss T——, and she was at a loss as to the method of procedure—but she soon "learned the ropes," using rice and sauce together. The sauce, however, appeared to be quite as agreeable to her palate as the rice, and I observed that the former was vanishing much faster than the latter; in fact, her rice was soon left somewhere. Then she tried the rice alone—tasted—looked at the dish of sauce—hitched round on her chair—and tasted again; but it was "no go"—she evidently wanted more of the sauce, but knew not what name to give it. At last, after repeated hitchings upon her chair, and looking at the dish of sauce, she summed her courage up to the sticking point, and addressed her hostess—"Cousin Ann, I'll thank you for a little more of that ointment!"

☞ Get thy spindle and distaff ready, and God will send flax.

BLACK EYES, BLUE EYES, AND OTHER KINDS OF EYES.

"A great quantity of virgin white paper has been blackened in idle attempts to cry up black eyes, blue eyes, and all sorts of common-place optics; but, after all, grey eyes must take the palm. Of all the eyes in the world, they are at once the most mischievous and most intelligent; and, a woman who has them, needs nothing else to make insuperability itself fall worshipping at her feet. As a very sensible lady-writer has said:—'Your blue are holy, heavenly, as the sky they reflect; your large brown, sluggish and indolent. We never knew an energetic person with soft brown eyes. Your black are ever keen, piercing, and fault-finding; but your grey! Commend us to a good clear grey eye, either in man or in woman. Such a one, bright and deeply set, intent rather on seeing than being seen—though when seen it is never forgotten—such an eye, beneath a well-defined brow, can obtain whatever it deserves.'"

Thus saith a writer whose name we do not know; and whose reputation, if he were known to all classes of eyes, might be deemed questionable.

The color of the eyes depends very much on the latitude and longitude in which their possessors reside.

In Newport, Rhode Island—which, the whole world admits, is the very Paradise of Beauty—you will rarely find a female whose eyes are not as "black as jet." And, then, again, goodness gracious! how they do sparkle! The man who has spent two hours in Newport, and not realized the effects of all powerful love, is a stoic, and something of a varyhead.

The Philadelphia ladies, almost without exception, are what are called hazel eyes—brunettes. They are of that class of beauties which were immortalized by Dibdin, when he wrote his beautiful song, which Incledon sung with so much effect and sweetness,

"I've saved from my hole, many hundreds in gold,
The comforts of life to beget,
I've horse in each climate the heat and the cold,
And all for my charming brunette."

The fair of Baltimore possess eyes and complexions very similar to those of their friends in Philadelphia; and, are remarkable for the possession and ostentatious display of all the graces.

The moment you cross the border line of Virginia, you enter on a region of blue eyes; and, they are

"——— ——— ———